WIDE OPEN SPACES

By FANNIE HURST

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service)

ONE of those experiences that you read about in books came to Alonzo Meierberg when he was thirty-one, and on the upward plunge of a wave of success as a young surgeon that was carrying him to the top of his profession.

He walked out of the office of one of his most distinguished confreres, with his own suspicion of himself corroberated. One of his lungs had a hole in it. Tuberculosis had him. The man who was considered the most brilliantly promising plastic surgeon in the city of New York, and that meant practically in America, was doomed, at thirty-one, to exile. If not permanent exile, and most probably that, then for a period of years that was apt to play havoc with the soaring of his career.

Well, Meierberg was about as logical as the average intellectual would be under such conditions. He placed his situation before him, so to speak. Reckoned on the alternative advantages of remaining at his post, and dying young and perhaps brilliantly, or going off to struggle for an existence that might not be worth the living.

With his mind, the latter alternative won. But love of life was too strong in this man to go down before the mere argument of a sophisticated brain.

In the end, Doctor Meierberg went out to a shanty town of an altitude and dryness necessary to his well being, and there took up his abode.

The wide open spaces. God's country. Back to nature.

Cactus Post was all those. A little smear of a town situated on the slope of a mountain that hung between desert and snow-caps. The sun came up in glory over Cactus Post and went down in magnificence. The air was as dry, as thin-tasting, as sparkling, as champagne and, every morning of his life Doctor Meierberg awoke to the incredibly lovely chipperings of birds he did not know by name, and to the clear ringing sound of axes hurling into the wilderness of tree boles that lined the mountain side.

Glory hung over Cactus Post. Dew-lit mornings. Peace-drenched noondays. Long, somnolent afternoons filed with what the doctor knew was sedative balm for his wounded lung. Evenings before a pine wood fire that went deeply up into the nostrils like the tickling elixir of a chartreuse. Leisure for reading that never before in all his closely packed years of struggle and endeavor had the doctor enjoyed. Boxes of books arrived from the East almost weekly, and were read! Not merely placed on a reading table to be read at some future time. But read, there and then.

The folks in Cactus Post were a goodly enough sort, too. Simple women and girls. Bred to the open spaces. Fearless folk. Fine, the doctor thought.

And yet it must be admitted that as the months marched along and then the years, such a nostalgia began to lay hold of the doctor that the heart of him was almost as sore as his healing lung had been.

Years of the coyote-riddled, night silences. The flaming sunrises ushering in the long, somnolent days. The gorgeous sunsets ushering them out. Monotony.

The old days began to gnaw at him. Closing his eyes of an evening beside his book-stacked fireplace, the doctor could visualize things back home. The incandescent-eyed city. Women who were a million years and three thousand miles alien to these husky, calico-clad ones, wrapping themselves in furs and riding out into the spangled evenings. The warm, vibrant flare of life along New York's Broadway. Mental stimulant of theaters and concerts. The voice of the city. The warm, pulsing note of humanity. That was it. Humanity. The doctor was lonesome unto death. The wide, open spaces were too wide. Too open. Humanity was a charmed circle closing within it life and love and warmth and beauty. Secretly, the nostalgia was becoming almost more than the doctor could bear. And yet, he knew that, somehow, he must stick it out for another year. He knew himself on the road to recovery but he dared not hasten the way along that road. Another year, what with careful living and right habits, would see the spot on his lung healed. Another year!

Sometimes, during the passing of it, the doctor feared for his sanity. Tedium of waiting. Terrible, terrible tedium of waiting.

Then there was his sense of delicacy and of actual fear of revealing his state of mind to the people about him. To the sweet-eyed Clarissa who rode in twelve miles on horseback to tend his shanty for him day by day and rode home through the purple, star-spangled desert without fear. The cowboys, the ranchers, the homesteaders who had been his good friends. Who took him along on their jaunts into the heart of the universe. Who taught him the secret things of nature. Who had been kind to him. Who were kind to him.

It was unthinkable to let these good people know how the heart within him was a heavy thing.

Up to the very day of his departure for the East, he kept it from them. Had not the heart to tell them that his departure was final. That he was shaking the desert dust off his feet forever.

They had been good. Kind. Their delight in his cure was scarcely less than his own.

When he finally stepped into the rattling tin can of a car that was to drive him the forty miles to the nearest station where he took his train, it was with the understanding that he was to return to them in the autumn. His shanty was to be there and waiting. His friends.

Like a sneak, the doctor turned his back on Cactus Post, knowing he had lied to them and yet had lied out of the kindness of his heart. The little group of them waving him good-by. The fellows. Bless them. The handful of women in their calico who had been so kind to him. Mrs. Hodges, the general storekeeper's wife, who had nursed him through bronchitis. Sweet-eyed Clarissa who had tended him so faithfully. Bless them.

The city met him like a boom of ocean, a surf of humanity running and hissing up against his feet his first step off the train.

Bing. Boom. Bang. The heart leapt in his bosom. The eager, quick-footed men. There! The women in their furs and the beautifying wrappings that he had so missed. Even their painted faces! Gaiety was here. Pulse of life. The streets swam vitality. Rush. Eagerness. Lights blazed. The hotel where he stopped had the warm, perfumed quality to it that reminded him of the bare shoulders of women and the whisper of furs.

Life! Vitality. Sophistication. Here were the men who made the universe go around. The women who made the universe matter.

The city caught him up once more. Goaded him. Spurred him. Within the month he was on the old tread-mill again, straining, yearning, aspiring. The young doctor was back in the race. The profession which had practically forgotten him began to turn an eye upon him again.

The doctor was back again. Cured. In the race.

And after the first six months, it was borne in upon an amazed, a startled young doctor that the race no longer mattered. His work, the scientific curiosity that spurred him on, his love of it, could not be best pursued here in these marts of men.

The doctor had tasted of the beauty and the peace and the nobility of quiet. He missed the ring of axes into wood. The gibberish of birds against dawn. The clear voices of women calling through high, thin air. This was a roar. The lights of the theaters represented the cheap tarnished pastimes that people sought. People without the leisure or the nerves for quiet reading. People who must forever be jamming, pushing, seeking. In all the months since his return, he had not had one evening for quiet reading. The stack of books beside his bed was half a man high. Life had him once more. By the scroff of the neck. The painted faces of the women mocked him. Pallid faces gone flabby from lack of the simple things that had kept those calico-clad ones out there firm fleshed and bright eyed even by light of dawn.

The autumn came around. The color of asphalt in the city. The color of quartz and topaz and cornelian and ruby and lapis lazuli in Cactus Post.

The doctor knew! Knew it with his heart that was aching.

And so, come autumn, as he had promised, the doctor did return to his shanty, in Cactus Post. A sunset the color of the blood that must have been surging around his heart met him as he stepped out of the rickety tin automobile that had driven him the many miles from the station.

Clarissa of the sweet eyes met him, too.

The doctor had come home.

Ruin Left in Wake of West Indian Hurricane

We hear a great deal about West Indian hurricanes, but the Virgin islands have been singularly free from destruction. It seems that in 400 years there have been 140 severe hurricanes, of which only ten touched St. Thomas and St. Croix.

On July 26, which is called Supplication day, all the people go to church, to ask God to preserve them from hurricanes. July 26 is considered the beginning of the hurricane season. On that day the natives pack their most valued possessions and begin to watch Signal hill.

When a storm is coming the government runs a flag up on Signal hill—a red flag with a black disk. When a second flag appears every one runs to "bar up."

The houses are all provided with heavy wooden shutters, to shut against the wind and rain. Masters and servants hurry about with hammers, nailing bars that close doors and windows.

When the third flag appears the hurricane is near, though there is always a warning of several hours. Then the world grows dark, and hot, and still. Not a leaf moves. It seems as though there must be a mistake. Then, suddenly, the gale breaks.

The usual length of a hurricane is 12 hours. The wind tears off roofs and uproots trees. The rain makes noise beyond belief. And the black night is filled with lightning. The sea comes in and floods the town, tearing up the cement waterfront, beating down the cabins on the shore.

At last it is over. Crops and groves are ruined. Great palm trees are felled. And there is devastation everywhere. But the sky is blue as heaven. And the sun dances on the waves. And the people all go up to church, to thank God because he spared their lives.

Beauty Talks

Fear of This and That

SOME women are born worriers, always full of apprehension. Think of all the things you have dreaded and feared. How many of them have really happened to you? Whether you are twenty—fifty—or eighty—you have probably spent a lot of energy worrying about things that never happened. The energy wasted in apprehension would have accomplished many worthwhile things! Fear, worry, and apprehension kept you from doing or attempting many things you would have liked to attempt, things you would have enjoyed and which would have made you a more versatile and interesting personality. For such emotions react upon the nerves. They diminish initiative and creative ability. Why meet life like a child in the dark, who fears there is a bear in the dark recess of the hall, and a bugaboo in the closet? Build up your resistance by using your energy for exercises which build and strengthen muscles; by sleeping in well-aired bedrooms; by keeping your house at a reasonable, even temperature; by taking baths and rubbing the body briskly with a Turkish towel to remove all clogging dead flakes of skin. You will improve your circulation to an extent which will increase your resistance against taking colds.

Sensible diet and avoiding constipation will increase your resistance against colds and against many other ills.

If you are always fearing this or that disease, you are probably always fearing this or that accident. If you are, you are depleting your physical health, and are depriving yourself of so many pleasure and personal contacts. Build up your health and tackle some of the bugaboos. Do some of the things you fear to do, and rid yourself of such phobias.

Arm yourself with common sense judgment as to precautions against disease and the accidents of recklessness, but don't be a coward. Cultivate a valiant spirit. Then the beauty treatments I prescribe will have a firm foundation. For an uplifted spirit will lift the face, without pain, danger or expense! You all know the adage "don't trouble trouble until trouble troubles you." It is a wise saying—that.

Be Natural and You Will Be Lovely

IT SEEMS to me that youth's greatest assets are naturalness, the health, the sparkle, glow and enthusiasm that are youth's rightful heritage. And youth's stumbling blocks are self-consciousness and overemphasis on physical beauty.

Youth is impatient to grow up, to be a definite personality, to make the world aware of that personality. The longest letters beauty editors receive are from the sweet young things. The greatest number of questions are asked by girls of twenty and under and twelve is the age at which they usually start. And the greatest mutiny against the powers that created them are voiced by these young girls. Nose too long and legs too short, too much hip and too little bust, hair too straight and too much curve to the figure. These are only a very, very few of the complaints. Youth's impatience. Young girls of fourteen should not attempt to adopt strenuous reducing regimes. Let nature take its course. A little excess fat for a few years won't hurt, and the gods may yet be good to you if you bide your time.

People seeking advice on how to cultivate a charming manner clearly indicate over-anxiety and self-consciousness. Be natural, be yourself, and you will be lovely. Let common sense guide you.

As for actual beauty aids, very few are necessary. Scrupulous cleanliness should be your creed. The health rules should be religiously observed.

A cleansing cream and good skin tonic and a little nourishing cream make a splendid group of facial preparations for the young girl of sixteen or so. A very good powder can grace her dressing table—but it should be very lightly applied. A good hair brush is a necessity, quite as much as the tooth brush. Beyond that, with the possible exception of the personal daintiness effects such as a deodorant, bath salts, body powder, and manicuring articles, nothing is necessary. And speaking of manicures, too-pointed nails and too brightly painted are all out of place on a sixteen-year-old hand.

Youth—natural lovely youth—eyes, clear and sparkling, skin glowing, body vibrant with health, is something we all try to cling to when it starts slipping. Cultivate a love of life and health. For fine living and fine thinking, interest and enthusiasm will give you more beauty and more lasting beauty than all the cosmetics in the world. Don't be impatient to grow up and make-up. Enjoy the bubbling beauty that is the very essence of youth.

EASY TO DETECT WORK OF FORGER

Signatures Especially Hard to Imitate.

"Every word we read has been written by some human hand. An ancient classic suggests the images of a multitude of diligent hands—strong ones, deftly hammering; slim esthetic fingers, laboriously drawing; those of the transcriber, the translator and on to the unmistakable flying hands of the modern typist and typesetter. And significantly enough, not one of these writers has duplicated the work of another." Katherine Applegate Keeler in Hygeia Magazine explains in detail how the scientific crime detection laboratory of Chicago determines the genuineness of specimens of handwriting and typewriting.

Sex, age, special characteristics, as in the script of engineers, the abbreviations and signs dear to such professions, library script, or shorthand marks, and changes in the fashion of handwriting are positive guides for the crime detector. The fact that no two persons write alike is of great significance also.

With these considerations it is not difficult for one trained in crime detection to distinguish between the forged signature and the original. Even if the forger manages to reproduce all the little details, twists and peculiarities which are the result of a complicated co-ordination that has become unconscious and habitual through the long practice of the "genuine" writer, he must go so slowly and carefully that the lines of his work are drawn instead of written. They will show, as a result of conscious guidance of the pen, changing movements, impulses or ink gatherings where the pen has slowed at a particularly difficult point; attempts to duplicate the delicate rapid changes in weight will result in an awkward wobbly line; beginning and ending lines will be abrupt and stubby as a result of meticulous care to begin and end at a point which the forger considers exactly correct.

In typed matter, it is also easy to detect certain errors on the part of a forger. The type faces of various makes of machines differ in the letters. Many models become out of date as each year they become improved. For instance, a 1926 machine cannot be used to write a document dated 1925 without recording a mark of fraudulence. An anachronism of ten years may be revealed by the length of a t crossing or by the humps of an m. Neither are two machines alike. Letters become defective, dirty or out of position.

Rock Gardens

A woman who had fallen prey to the mania for rock gardens had constructed what she regarded a most artistic example of the prevailing fad. The flag paths, concrete pedestal surmounted with sun dial, flowers planted among the rocks and all the other accessories presumably necessary to form the complete whole. The woman was contemplating her finished work with much satisfaction when a teamster pulled up to the curb and called out: "Say, missus, would you like to have them there rocks hauled away? I'll do it cheap for ye!"

Lucky Accident

Le Roy Dunakey, of Seattle, never thought he would like to participate in a serious traffic accident, but he is now glad that he was in a car that overturned and burst into flames. He married the seventeen-year-old girl who helped pull him out of the wreckage and took him to a hospital.

Wonderful Clock Made by Italian Artificer

A clock so complicated that no watchmaker alive could possibly understand its workings has been completed by a patient man named Costanzo Renzi of Rimini, Italy, after two years of assiduous attention. The 36-hour clock, almost entirely made of bamboo and built in the form of the Fascist emblem, is 3 feet high. Besides marking the hour, the minute and the second, this wonderful timepiece also shows the phases of the moon, the day of the week, the month and the day of the month. Besides, here are some more extravagances: When the clock strikes, a small flag with pictures of the king and Il Duce appears and the chimes play "Giovinezza," the Fascist hymn. When these are over a small mortar on the top of the clock fires a salvo and a tiny tricolor makes another appearance. Inventor Renzi assured school children that try as he might he couldn't get the contrivance to do home lessons.

The Desert's Price

By William MacLeod Raine

A story of the cattle range, a tale of feud and romance. For years the McCanns and the Starks have openly carried on a bitter feud. When Julia Stark comes home from school in Los Angeles and sees William McCann, there is the call of youth to youth. Then old Stark is found dead with a bullet hole in his temple and young McCann standing by. Almost simultaneously there is a shot and McCann falls. Enemies though they are, Julia nurses him back to life. Despising him for what she believes he did, yet loving him for himself—she works out her own romance.

William MacLeod Raine has given us a story of a desert feud, of lives filled with active living, with great hates, great adventures, great loves—a story which holds the reader to the interest of the rapidly developing plot.

It will run serially in these columns and you will want to read it. Watch for the opening chapters.

MARSHALL COUNTY FAIR AT WARREN JUNE 27, 28 and 29

Elaborate preparations are now complete for the staging of the 26th annual Marshall County Fair which will open at the Fair Grounds at Warren on Monday for a three day run in conjunction with the annual summer convention of the Ninth District American Legion and Auxiliary, according to Wm. Forsberg, president of the fair association.

County Fair and Convention officials are anticipating record breaking crowds at the big exposition scheduled to take place Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday with people from all sections of Marshall and adjoining counties planning to attend.

Entry day for the fair will be on Monday, with entries slated to close at one p. m. Every department gives promise of having an unusual number of entries this year, while the 4-H club exhibits will surpass those of any other year. The Marshall County 4-H club exhibit is the largest at any county fair in Minnesota, state records show.

The fair program will start with the evening program Monday night which will be featured by the first appearance of Rosie's Ritz Revue. Other events of the evening will be free acts and races and closing with a big pavillion dance at the new Fair Grounds Pavillion which is now under construction.

Tuesday and Wednesday are the banner days of the fair when the outstanding programs in county fair history will be presented. Coupled with numerous special attractions secured for the American Legion Convention together with horse races, drum and bugle corps exhibitions, the Ninth District American Legion Band, Silent drill exhibition by Company M of the Minnesota National Gaurd and some outstanding grandstand attractions that have ever been presented before a Marshall county fair crowd, the visitors will be kept busy every minute of the time spent in Warren.

On Wednesday afternoon Oscar F. Youngdahl, president of the Minnesota Department of the American Legion will deliver an address while Wednesday evening R. A. Trovatten, Minnesota Commissioner of Agriculture will speak before the Grandstand. Wednesday evening the Grand Forks American Legion Drum Corps will perform, while on Tuesday afternoon, evening and Wednesday afternoon the Crookston Ladies Auxiliary drum corps will give special exhibitions.

The annual American Legion parade will form downtown on Wednesday at 12:30 and after parading through the principal streets of the city, will pass in revue before the Grandstand. This parade will consist of bands drum corps, decorated floats, Legion Auxiliary and Boy Scout members. The parade will be one of the biggest and outstanding parades ever attempted in Warren.

On the Midway, the fair association has contracted with the Lachman Exposition Shows, one of the largest companies of its kind on the road today. To transport this company's shows, rides and concessions requires 20 full length railroad car. It is the biggest midway attraction that has ever appeared on the Marshall County Fair Grounds.

In addition to the splendid programs arranged for afternoon and evening appearances, the fair association through the cooperation of more than 80 business places in Marshall county will give away $300 in cash due bills good for trade at the business firms cooperating. The $300 will be distributed on Tuesday afternoon at 4 o'clock, with six prizes being awarded. On Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock a Chevrolet coach, completely equipt with spare tire, bumpers, tire lock, and ornamental radiator cap purchased from the Amundgaard Machine Co., at Argyle will be given away. Holders of tickets must be present in order to receive any of the prizes to be given away the two days.

The fair has reduced its admission charges for the 1932 exposition, the evening prices being dropped to 25 cents while the afternoon prices are 50 cents for adults. Children under 12 years will be admitted free if accompanied by parent or gaurdian. The prices were reduced in order to make it easier for all people in this section to attend and derive benefit from the fair which belongs to the people of Marshall County.

The Desert's Price

SYNOPSIS

Drawn by the desert signal of distress, Wilson McCann, young Arizona ranchman, finds an old friend, Jim Yerby, with a broken leg. Julia Stark, daughter of Matthew Stark, inveterate enemy of the McCanns, signaled and is rendering first aid. Taking a note from Julia to her father, Wilson is fired on by Jasper, Julia's brother. Stark, Sr., expresses disbelief of Wilson's account of the shooting.

CHAPTER II

The Giffords

Doctor Sanders was smoking a pipe in front of Yerby's cabin when McCann dismounted.

"How's Jim?" the horseman asked.

"He's taking a little nourishment Miss Julia fixed up for him. How'd you come out at the Circle Cross? I see they didn't scalp you."

"No," McCann said dryly. "They sent a messenger to meet me."

The doctor's sparkling eyes guaranteed attention. He guessed that something interesting had occurred and he was a born gossip.

"Jas Stark shot at me an' lit out. I followed him lickety-split to the ranch. We had a few pleasant words, the old man an' me."

"Shot at you? He didn't! How come he to do that? They don't like you a lick of the road, you or any of your kin. But—shooting! Who started it?"

In a few crisp sentences McCann told the story. The doctor listened, absorbed. Was this the beginning of the end? Would the smouldering feud break into open warfare, bitter and tragic? If he knew the McCanns—and he thought he did—they were not the kind to take this challenge tamely. They came of fighting Irish stock, upon which had been grafted four generations of American frontier life. There were likely to be reprisals.

Even now both camps were waiting tensely for the signal to begin hostilities openly. The death of Tom McArdle had brought them to the point of war. But the doubt as to who had killed him had made for delay. Matthew Stark had hesitated to give the word. While he brooded, willing to let events shape themselves, Jasper had fired a wanton shot that might be the first of hundreds.

The doctor rose and with a sigh of resignation knocked the ashes out of his pipe. He saw busy days and nights ahead of him. Well, it was in the hands of the gods, or rather of two grim hard men with too much of the desert fierceness in their blood. He was a pawn in the game they played, just as were the rollicking boys who would ride out laughing to meet death at the lift of a hand.

"No use telling you so, of course, but it's all wrong, Wils—this putting yourselves above the law and killing so free and easy."

"Have I been killin' anybody free and easy, Doc? Better speak to Jas Stark about that, hadn't you?"

"I'm not meaning you, Wils. But some one shot Tom McArdle."

"None of our outfit, Doc. You don't mean we had anything to do with it." The eyes of the range rider were bleak.

"No, Wils. Nothing like that. But you know how the Starks feel. They're holding it against you boys of the Flying VY."

Sanders knew by the other's face that they were no longer alone. He turned, to see Julia Stark in the doorway.

"Who else would we hold it against, Doctor?" she asked curtly, looking straight at the younger man.

There was a thin ironic smile on the brown face of McCann. He murmured, with the soft drawl of insolence to which he sometimes reverted, "Nobody else would have dry-gulched him, would they?"

"What d'you mean?" the girl demanded.

The man in chaps said nothing, but he continued to give her that mocking smile. It was the doctor who answered at last.

"Tom was quite a boy for the girls, Miss Julia. Folks say—some folks do—that maybe some one who was jealous or wanted revenge might have laid for him."

The girl's dark eyebrows gathered in a frown. "First I've heard of it—that Tom was so fond of the girls. And if he was—if he did like them—is that any crime, any reason why some one would want to kill him?"

"I reckon you didn't know Tom very well," the doctor said judicially with intent to hold an even balance between the Stark and the McCann. "He was a mite wild, Miss Julia, by the stories I've heard."

"I don't know anything about that. I never saw him but once." She swept defiant eyes over the rider. "But I don't believe a word about a private enemy killing him."

"You wouldn't," agreed the younger man.

The implications of his smile stirred her anger. Stiffly she turned and walked into the house.

Those outside heard Yerby:

"Don't I hear that Flying VY boy chinnin' with the doc?"

"Yes. Want to see him?"

"I reckon. Before he goes."

Julia made things snug for the night.

"Hope you'll have a good night and sleep well," she said.

"I'll be fine an' dandy," he assured.

Outside the girl spoke indifferently to the night, "Mr. Yerby wants to see you before you go."

Since Doctor Sanders had just been explaining that he intended to stay all night with his patient, McCann was justified in assuming that this impersonal remark was addressed to him. He went into the house.

"How they stackin', old-timer?" he asked.

"I'll make a hand yet. What's worryin' me is I've got to lie here like a bump on a log an' let a kid like you see Miss Julia home. She's outa luck. Well, give my love to Pa Stark when you get to the Circle Cross."

"Was that what you wanted to tell me?"

Little imps of deviltry danced in the beady eyes. "No, Wils. A wink is as good as a nod to a blind hoss. Scratch gravel, boy. You know the ol' saying: Opportunity is like a bald-headed guy with chin whiskers; you can catch him comin' but not going."

McCann's answer was direct. "I'm not liable to forget that she's Matt Stark's daughter, so you needn't look so blamed knowin' Jim. I don't like her any more'n she does me."

"Sho! She's a mighty nice li'l girl, an' the best lookin' one in Arizona."

"No Stark looks good to me," the son of Peter McCann said grimly.

* * * * * * *

They were taking the short cut across the desert before either of them spoke.

"What did you say your name is?" she asked, rather imperiously.

"They call me Wilson."

The girl noticed the slight pause before he had drawled the answer. It probably was not his right name, she reflected. A good many men did not use the one to which they were born. In that country it was not good form to insist on particulars as to who a man had been or from where he had come.

"You ride for the McCanns."

He assented, without words.

Silence fell again between them. They had come out of the slit and were threading a way among the steel-thorned yuccas. The moon and the stars were out, touching the land as by a magic wand. All harsh detail was blurred. Ten thousand years of drought were wiped out. A soft desert breeze was sighing gently across a sleeping world.

His words, when at last they came, were a surprise. "Why isn't it always like this?" he asked, speaking almost to himself rather than to her.

"How do you mean, like this?"

But she knew, she hoped she knew, what he meant before he answered. For the desert had entered into her life, too. She sensed its moods and reflected them in her own. Sometimes it was a hot devouring monster blasting all living things with its fiery breath; again at sunset, when light was flooding over the sheen of the mesquite, it might be a silver dragon less destructive. In the moonlight it was kind of lovely, all ugliness and threat obliterated.

A crouching animal slipped quickly across the trail into the chaparral.

"Coyote?" she asked.

"Wildcat," he answered. Then, with unexpected bitterness. "That's the desert for you."

Again she understood what he meant, and again asked, "What do you mean?"

"Survival of the fit."

"Isn't that true everywhere?"

"Maybe so, but the conditions are different. Everything that lives here is born and bred in hardship, trained for attack an' defense. No escape from it. All the plants have thick an' callous rinds. They have thorns that sting. They have to push their roots 'way into the ground to get water. If they don't toughen they die. Tha's what's ailin' us humans. We're desert-bred."

"Aren't people the same everywhere?" she asked.

"No. Here we have to fight or go under. We fight the drought and heat of nature. We fight each other for the water holes. If we don't we lose out. Consequence is we get fierce and savage like that wildcat."

"Yes," she admitted with a sigh. "We're all under the spell of it, all hard and relentless, kinda. But we don't have to be—what is it you called that wildcat?—ferocious and sly. The desert shows its teeth most of the time. It's full of sting and barb and thorn. But that's only one side of it. All the time it's trying to tell us something else, too, isn't it?"

His brooding eyes rested on her. So she, too, felt it, this wild young thing so full of contrary impulses, of passionate resentments, of brave elusive dreams, of mysterious cravings for goodness and beauty. He forgot that she was of the enemy. Something primeval stirred in him, a joy old as the race, that walked with Adam and Eve in the garden. Without taking thought of it he knew that they rode alone in a world wonderful.

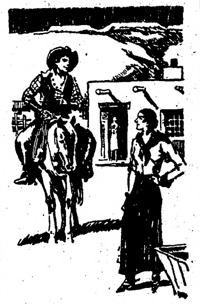
"What's it tryin' to tell us?" he asked in his low gentle voice.

"I don't know—quite. But something good—and hopeful. The lovely flowers of the yucca and the cactus—aren't they a promise to us?" She laughed at herself, soft-eyed. "Maybe that seems silly to you. But it's the way I feel. Tonight, now. In all this still moonlight the desert isn't threatening us, is it?"

They were drawing up into a country of creased arroyos. On the crest of a hillock they stopped and looked back across the Painted desert. The man was for moment carried out of himself. Looking at this starry-eyed girl, clean and innocent and rhythmic in the freshness of her youth, it seemed possible to escape the inheritance of his dark environment. There was something in life deeper than hate and selfishness and revenge if he could only find it.

Down the wind came drumming the sound of hoofs. The two listened in silence. Each, sitting poised and alert on their mounts, knew that several horses with riders were moving rapidly toward them. The fact had its significance in a country where one might travel a day without meeting a human being. Voices became clear, a snatch of laughter, an oath. Silhouetted against the skyline, three cow ponies moved along the ridge across the arroyo.

Julia gave a little cry of greeting, lost in the clipclop of the hoofs and the chufling of the saddle leather. She turned to her companion, to suggest that they canter down and intersect the riders. But the words died on her lips.



Resentment at Life's Injustice Marred Her Dark Good Looks.

The man beside her was watching the riders as they descended from the ridge and disappeared. He sat crouched, eyes narrowed to hard shining slits of light, teeth clamped like a vice. The change in him shocked her. He had become a machine designed to stalk and kill, a desert animal savage and ferocious, the deadlier for the stillness of his emotion.

"Did you—know who they were?" she asked.

The eyes that looked at her were chill. He nodded without speech.

"I reckon Dad sent them to bring me home."

She knew he would not accept that explanation, since she could not believe it herself. They had come through Tincup pass and were headed south. Moreover, they carried rifles. Why? What did they want with them?

"Does it need three men to bring you home—two Texas hired killers like Stone an' Gitner, as well as yore brother?"

"Killers! Who says my father's men are killers?" she flamed. "Who are you, anyhow?"

"Wils McCann," he flung back at her.

He could see her recoil and stiffen. "I might have known it. You liar!" She threw the epithet like a missile in his face. "If I were a man—"

"You've got an able-bodied brother," he suggested, ironically. "Maybe you could get him to take a crack at me from the mesquite. He might have better luck next time."

"I don't know what you're talking about," the girl said scornfully.

"Ask him when you see him again. He wouldn't lie, Jasper wouldn't. He's a Stark, you know."

She swung her horse and gave it a touch of the spur. Before it had gone twenty steps the man was riding beside her again.

"Hit the trail!" she ordered hotly. "I don't need your help to get home."

"I reckon not," he drawled. "But I promised Doc, so I'll mosey along."

She pulled up, a diamond-hard glitter in her eyes. "I'm going to my brother. I'd advise you to light out."

"After I know you're safe." His voice was cool and dry, his gaze level and unwavering.

"If I tell Dave Stone and that Gitner what you called them—killers—"

"Why, then they'll prove it to you right there," he cut in with a jeering laugh. "Seeing is believing. They claim we owe 'em one for Tom McArdle, an' they'll collect now."

A tempest of impotent anger surged in her. His words were meant to affront and challenge her. Not since she had been in her early teens had she felt so uncontrollable an impulse to break out in crackling speech that pelted like hail. What was there in this hateful man that stirred so deeply the wild and lawless elements of her being, so long dormant?

Julia's glance swept the landscape. The last of the three riders was disappearing into an arroyo. Obligingly McCann pointed him out. In a weak voice she called to her brother.

Her companion's smile was mocking. "Lemme get him for you." Before she could stop him there came from his throat the far-carrying yell of the cowpuncher. "Yi yi yippy yi!"

She had a shaken sense of stilled pulses, the premonition of impending disaster. But it was too late to ride away now. Already the three riders were showing darkly in silhouette against the sky line. She waited with dread beside this enemy of her family while the men rode toward them.

"Who is it?" Jasper Stark demanded.

Julia called her name to him. She heard him say to his companions, "Jule an' Doc Sanders." He was riding in the lead and it was not till he had pulled up his horse that his startled oath announced recognition of McCann.

Hurriedly Julia explained. "Doctor Sanders had to stay all night with Jim Yerby. He asked Mr. McCann to see me home."

"Since when has Wils McCann been yore friend, Jule," her brother demanded harshly.

"He's no friend of mine. I didn't know who he was till he told me just now."

"The Starks know me well enough to shoot at me but not well enough to pass the time of day," McCann added tauntingly. "An' that's about as well as I want to know most of them."

His gaze moved to the Texans. Gitner was a big rangy fellow with the appearance and manner of a bully. He looked dangerous, but not so much so as the man on his right. There was a deadly quality about the stillness of Stone. Only the chill light-blue eyes were quick with life. McCann knew his reputation and one long steady exchange of looks told him this small brown Texan would live up to it.

"You didn't shoot at him from the mesquite, Jas, did you?" his sister asked.

"Been runnin' to you about it, has he?" snarled Stark. "Well, there's nothin' to it. I shot to warn him back, an' he's been bellyachin' ever since."

"I knew it was something like that," the girl replied quickly.

McCann laughed, softly and derisively.

"Something amusin' you?" Gitner wanted to know, heavy lower jaw thrust forward aggressively.

The Arizonian met him eye to eye. "Any law against laughing, Mr. Gitner?"

"Depends how you laugh an' where."

"If I could get Mr. Gitner to show me how an' where—"

Stone interrupted, quietly, each drawling word spaced evenly. "If my name was Wils McCann I'd light out now muy pronto." His eyes were slits of shining menace.

Julia, alarmed, moved her horse a step or two so that she was between the Flying VY rider and his foes. "Yes," she said, and her voice was not quite steady, "I'd go now, Mr. McCann—please."

"Tha's good advice, I reckon," he agreed. "Or I might not go at all. Yore friends seem anxious."

He lifted his sombrero in a sweeping bow, swung Jim-Dandy, and moved away at a road gait. The thing was done raffishly and flippantly, with obvious intent to irritate.

Julia was relieved when the darkness swallowed him and his horse. "We'd better go home now," she said to her brother.

Jasper was annoyed and showed it. He looked at his companions, doubtful what to do.

With a dry ironic smile Stone settled the matter. They could not go about their errand now, since the information that they were night riding had become public property.

"Why yes, Jas. Might as well go home, I reckon, like Miss Julie tells us," the little Texan said with gentle sarcasm. "We taken all the ride tonight we need for our health."

* * * * * * *

On his way back to the Yerby place from the Flying VY next morning Wilson McCann passed a sheep ranch on the mesa. The place belonged to the Gifford sisters. They had inherited it a few years before from a stiff-necked uncle who had brought sheep in regardless of opposition from the cattle interests. It had been an ill-starred venture, followed by quarrels, warnings, raids, and bloodshed. Old Andy Gifford died while the trouble was at its height and the hostility had been passed on to his nieces. But it took the form of sullen aloofness rather than active warfare. The neighborhood did not like sheep, was disturbed at the presence of these "hoofed locusts" eating up the range, yet could not bring itself to the point of driving out three defenseless women.

When their uncle died Ann Gifford had been twenty-two, Nora past nineteen, and Ethel sixteen. Far from friends, on the edge of the desert, the life of the girls was a lonely one. The ranchmen of the district looked upon them with ill-concealed resentment. Their wives and daughters paid no friendly visits.

But in a man's country these three attractive girls were a magnet not to be resisted. A few cowpunchers met them and broke down the barrier. Rumors began to fly, as they must when presentable young women are visited only by men. At last the wagging tongue of gossip found something tangible to whisper. Ann and Nora Gifford had taken the train for Los Angeles, while the youngest of the three was attending school at Tucson. Some months later the older sister returned alone, hard-eyed, close-mouthed. No letters from Nora ever came to the ranch, it was observed at the post office. Where was she? What had become of her?

During Ann's absence a band of sheep had been harried and driven over a cliff by night riders. Ann's lips shut tighter, the lines about them grew harder. Since her return she and Ethel lived alone.

McCann lifted his hat. "Howdy, Miss Gifford. What's the good word?" he asked.

Ann Gifford was thin, brown, dry as a chip. Her eyes blazed a burning bitterness. Resentment at life's injustice marred her dark good looks.

"What can I do for you?" she said bluntly.

"For me? Nothing, ma'am," he replied, disconcerted. "I reckoned there might be somethin' I could do for you. When there's no men folks on a place a husky willing lad comes in handy sometimes. If you need me—"

"We don't."

"Now or any time, why—"

"Not now or any time," she snapped.

McCann was embarrassed but persistent. He had met the Gifford girls only two or three times, and then casually. But he had thought a good deal about the hard lines into which their lives had fallen.

"I'd be pleased to help any way I could."

"We'll not trouble you, thanks." Her refusal of his offer had the crack of a whiplash.

This was definite enough. McCann searched for some meaningless phrase to soften what she had said.

"Well, it's an open offer, ma'am. I'll be movin' on now. Jim Yerby's done broke his leg an' I'm kinda lookin' after him."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Early Christian Burial Custom Not Understood

Strange burial customs of the early Christians were discovered by the University of Pennsylvania museum expedition during its third season of excavation at Meydum, Egypt.

"In the vaulted chamber of a burial of the Christian period," a report from Alan Rowe, field director of the expedition, said, "many of the Christian bodies were buried in very bright garments and some of them had small pieces of sheepskin piled over their faces to a height of almost 20 inches. The significance of this custom is not known to us."

One of the most important discoveries of the excavators was a limestone slab bearing the only known contemporary portrait of King Seneferu to be found in Egypt. Seneferu was an Egyptian ruler who lived almost 5,000 years ago and who was responsible for the building of the great pyramid at Meydum.

Carved in relief, it depicts the king wearing a close-fitting cap, above which are the horns of a ram supporting two curved plumes.

Flower Growing a Gamble

Southern France, and Italy and Spain to a lesser extent, having succeeded certain oriental and Balkan regions as the center of production of flowers and their essences, enjoy a quite lucrative trade from them. It is an important business. Since growing regions for choice products are small, crop failures, not unusual with so delicate a product, cause abrupt and violent fluctuations. For the same reason, speculation in these commodities is gambling of a most precarious sort.

Molasses Windows

An English scientist has developed a method which may prove one of the most important inventions for many years. At the present time the world produces more sugar than it can use for food. One of the great problems is to know what to do with the surplus. The invention concerns a process by means of which crude sugar in the form of molasses can be converted into a substance as hard and as transparent as glass. It has, moreover, the valuable property of passing the health-giving ultra-violet rays which are stopped by ordinary window-glass. The material can be blown, molded, or rolled, just like glass.

Annuities

The date when annuities, that is, fixed annual payments for life to individuals in return for a certain consideration, were first devised, is not certain, but the first annuity table of record was in Rome, in 40 B. C. The business has been on a volume basis for only about thirty years, but prior to that time was quite extensive for fifty or more years among American companies doing a large foreign business.

Mercolized Wax Keeps Skin Young

Get an ounce and use as directed. Fine particles of aged skin peel off until all defects such as pimples, liver spots, tan and freckles disappear. Skin is then soft and velvety. Your face looks years younger. Mercolized Wax brings out the hidden beauty of your skin. To remove wrinkles use one ounce Powdered Saxolite dissolved in one-half pint witch hazel. At drug stores.

Sight-Saving Methods Aiding Children's Eyes

Four hundred sight-saving classes have been established in the schools of 112 American communities, according to statistics received by the Better Vision institute. The classes are conducted so as to put the least possible strain on the children whose eyes are naturally defective; large-type books are used, the children can choose their own positions in the classroom so that they can see the blackboard, without difficulty, and they are taught to use the touch system on the typewriter as soon as possible to avoid the strain of handwriting. According to the institute, one out of five children are handicapped by defective vision, and since they are compelled to attend school up to a certain age, school authorities are beginning to realize that they owe a special responsibility to the 5,000,000 out of the 26,000,000 children in the United States who do not see well.

Ancient System Revived

The old craftsmanship of the Middle ages is being revived by the Greenwich house workshops in New York. Youths are trained there in stone cutting, wood carving, cabinet-making and bronze work, under the five-hundred-year-old apprenticeship system as it was practiced in the days of the old masters of arts and crafts. In this school where, it is hoped, the machine-made art of the present day may be counteracted, there are already 30 or 40 students at work. They are all of foreign parentage, the majority being Italian and most of them from poor families.

Long Railway Rails

The longest railway rails in the world are to be laid in England soon. They measure 90 feet in length, compared with the usual length of 30, 45 and 60 feet. It is hoped that the longer rails will provide smoother running, less noise and wear. It is estimated that on a train traveling 40 miles an hour on 30-foot rails, each wheel jolts 117 times a minute, due to the joints. On the new rails this number will be reduced to 39 a minute.

Reduced 30 Pounds Never Felt Better

Safe Way to Loose Fat

Take the case of Miss Madelone Crowley, for instance, who lives in Little Rock, Ark. Just read her letter:

"I have used Kruschen Salts for one year—when I started I weighed 140 pounds—now I weigh 110 pounds and never felt better in my life."

That's the big reason a host of men and women take Kruschen to lose weight—as the fat goes you gain in health—skin clears—eyes grow bright—activity replaces indolence.

Take one-half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water every morning before breakfast—cut down on fatty meats, potatoes and sweets—a jar of Kruschen that costs but a trifle lasts 4 weeks—get it at any drugstore in the world—but for your health's sake demand and get Kruschen Salts.

New Corn Crosses May Help Canners

Inbred Strains Boost Yield and Also Mature Uniformly.

(By PROF. R. A. EMERSON, Cornell University Agricultural Experiment Station.)

While it makes little difference to a hog whether the corn he eats is of an equal ripeness, the market gardener, and particularly the canner, should have all the ears of one planting in prime condition on the same day. To bring about this equal ripening, investigators at agricultural experiment stations have developed strains of corn which not only yield one-fourth more than ordinary varieties, but have the additional virtue of maturing at one time.

Crosses of inbred strains of corn have been mainly of field corn varieties for grain or for silage, but enough tests have been made with sweet corn to indicate distinct advantages to the canners.

It is more expensive to grow the crossed seed, and I doubt whether seed growers will make a success of it if they must start at the beginning and produce their own inbred strains by several years of careful breeding and experiment. The growing of inbred strains and the making and testing of crosses is the work of experiment stations. When desirable combinations are discovered, the experiment stations should, under proper safeguards, turn over to the seed growers the necessary inbred strains or single crosses. Experiment stations are not only willing but anxious to provide such strains as are already developed.—Exchange.

Beekeeping Advised as Supplement to Farming

The average beekeeper will make the most profits if he limits his business to 400 colonies, the number he can care for single-handed, the United States Department of Agriculture says. He may be a first-rate bee handler, but the temperament of a good beeman generally is not the temperament for managing employees efficiently.

One man can do practically all of the work required for 350 to 400 colonies, even during rush seasons, the department learned by studying for three years the records of beekeepers in widely separated regions of the country. With an apiary of this size, however, he will need some additional means of income. Beekeeping is at its best, generally, as a supplement to farming. One man in New York state, who farms 100 acres and cares for 70 colonies of bees, learned from experience that a 70-colony apiary is equivalent to about 40 acres of land in both income and labor.—Wisconsin Agriculturist.

The Adaptable Soybean

Our sows have been running in the cornfield all winter. The attraction was the soybeans which had been planted with the corn. The exercise has been great for the hogs and the soybeans have furnished protein. If sows slack up on going to the field some corn can be scattered about as an added incentive.

Our clover seeding for this year is very spotted due to the severe dry weather last year. The stand varies from perfect in some places to absolute bareness in others. It is too good to plow up and yet not good enough to leave.

The good spots we have left undisturbed. Where the clover is fair we broadcast oats in this spring and disked them in; where there was no clover we plowed and planted soybeans. In this way, unless something unforeseen appears, we will be able to take a hay crop from the whole field and not disrupt our rotation.

Soybeans, when properly inoculated, are nitrogen gatherers; that is, soil builders.—Farm Journal.

Emergency Hay

There is no one best emergency hay crop. We have a wide variety from which to choose. Soybeans planted thick (seed is cheap and plentiful) give excellent yields, both as to quality and quantity. For cattle and sheep, soybean hay can rarely be improved upon. In southern Iowa, a mixture of soys and sudan is preferred by many to soys alone. Neither makes desirable feed for horses during heavy work; however, soybean hay is a fairly good winter roughage.

Oats seeded heavily and cut ten days or two weeks before normal harvest time makes an excellent general purpose hay. Some northwestern Iowa farmers claim that a mixture of oats and wheat makes better horse hay than pure oats. — Wallace's Farmer.

Cultivate Orchards Early

Many fruit growers wait too long before cultivating orchards and also continue too long in the summer. The orchard that is cultivated should be worked up by the time the trees come into blossom. Then stop cultivation by July. This program makes nitrogen available early in the season and cultivation is stopped in time so that good color is secured and the growth which is made becomes mature and is therefore not subject to winter killing.—American Agriculturist.

Fertilizers Do Much to Improve Pasture

Records Have Proved Value of Treatments.

What will fertilizers do for pastures? Twenty-six farmers in southeastern Ohio answered the question by making fertilizer trials. Each laid out seven plots and under the direction of D. R. Dodd, soils and crops specialist for Ohio State university, gave varying treatments to the different plots and kept records of the pasturage yield.

The most profitable treatment was 50 pounds of nitrogen, 120 pounds of phosphoric acid and 80 pounds of potash an acre. Plots which received this application yielded 4,116 pounds of grass an acre compared with 1,473 pounds where no fertilizer was applied. The treatment cost $10.03 an acre which left $32.58 profit. Grass from the untreated plots was valued at $14.03 an acre. An increase of 2,447 pounds of grass was credited to an application of 50 pounds of nitrogen and 120 pounds of phosphoric acid an acre. The cost was $9.63 and the value above cost was $31.53.

Other treatments and the returns above costs were: 120 pounds of phosphoric acid an acre, $16.57; 120 pounds phosphoric acid and 80 pounds potash, $19.23; 50 pounds nitrogen, $23.82; 25 pounds nitrogen, 120 pounds phosphoric acid and 80 pounds potash, $26.24; 50 pounds nitrogen, 30 pounds phosphoric acid and 20 pounds potash, $29.52.—Capper's Farmer.

Cheap Crop Protection in Treatment of Seed

Treating seed is a common practice on modern farms. Farmers have accustomed themselves to protecting potatoes, oats, barley, and wheat from attacks of bacterial and fungus diseases. Experiment stations are finding that corn also suffers from fungus diseases through which losses of varying extent result. These stations have also discovered that proper treatment will save these losses. Such treatment has added substantially to the yields of the resulting crops while the cost is not more than five cents per acre.

The Illinois experiment station makes this statement: "Some very striking increases in stand, vigor and yield of corn have been obtained from seed treatment. Even with the very best seed obtainable, seed treatment, in Illinois experiments, has usually proved worth while. Treated seed can be planted earlier with greater safety than untreated seed, for there is less danger of damage because of unfavorable weather conditions, in case it should lie on the ground a long time before sprouting. Seed treatment may also be of special benefit in case the soil is wet when the corn is in the seeding stage."

Terracing Costs

Cost of terracing cultivated land varies from $3 to $4 an acre to as high as $12 to $15, depending largely upon character of soil, slope of land, and amount of erosion that already has taken place, says the bureau of agricultural engineering, United States Department of Agriculture. It is more expensive to terrace a field that is badly cut up with gullies than one which has a comparatively smooth slope. Gullies have to be crossed by terraces, and much extra work is necessary to strengthen terraces at such points. The bureau believes that $4 to $8 an acre is a conservative estimate of the average cost of terracing.

Potatoes and Potash

Potash is needed in large amounts by potatoes, according to fertilizer experiments being conducted at the Ohio experiment station. Since farm manure is high in potash, averaging about ten pounds per ton, eight tons or more per acre will maintain the potash supply. In recent years, large acreages of potatoes are being grown without manure, cover crops being plowed down to give the proper physical condition. With this system, at least 80 pounds of potash are required in the fertilizer to insure a yield of 300 bushels per acre.—Wallace's Farmer.

Agricultural Hints

Poultry experts estimate that a hen producing 100 eggs per year has paid her way for feed and labor and that all eggs above this number represent clear gain.

* * *

Twigs, dead flower stalks and garden debris should be burned rather than placed in the compost pile. They afford a splendid harbor for insect pects if allowed to remain on the premises.

* * *

Three crops per season are all that an alfalfa stand should be expected to produce. In a number of tests it has been demonstrated that four crops have greatly reduced the stand during the first season.

* * *

Feeding cattle dry hay just before turning them on rich, legume pasture reduces danger of bloat.

* * *

Peonies and iris like plenty of water as they are coming into bloom. Remember the big overhead they are producing and give them water accordingly.

* * *

Plant potatoes at least 3 or 4 inches below the level surface of the field. The tubers set deeper are less subject to blight, rot, sunburn, second growth, and other tuber defects.

America Might Profit by Academy of Humor

Establishment of an American Academy of Humor has been suggested. We fear it would too frequently be drawing comparisons between Mark Twain, Bob Burdette and Bill Nye and our present generation of laugh makers. There was an Age of Poesy. It passed. And has the Age of Humor in America gone over the hill?

This is the age of mechanics and mechanism. The race has its moods, as do individuals. Long ago its minds was possessed of a medieval religiosity; and it exhorted and proselyted in the name of its newfound savior.

Next it flew in pursuit of "liberty" and performed such deeds before high heaven as would make the angels weep. It romanticized with Shakespeare and Dante and made war with Charles XII and Napoleon. It took its pen in hand with Shelley, Keats and Tennyson, and in America with Bryant and Longfellow.

Then it laughed with Artemus Ward and Twain, Nye, Burdette, George Ade, George Fitch and all that school. Now, upon what is it most employing its still substantial intellect? Certainly not on Humor. Let us have the American Academy of Humor and see what it can do for us.—F. H. Collier in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Ideal Dwelling Place for the "Simple Lifer"

The loneliest village in England boasts six names—Wiston, Wissington, Wisson, Wisseen, Wiseton and Whiston—and one motorcycle, one wireless set, one inn and one dart-board.

This village, surrounded by cornfields and towering trees, has hardly changed since the old cottages were built hundreds of years ago. The village was in existence in 1066.

It has no electric light, gas or water supply, shop, telephone or meeting hall. There is not even a village green. It shares a policeman with three neighboring villages.

Many of the inhabitants have never been more than ten miles from home, and the majority of the old farmers and laborers have never been inside a cinema or theater, some have never ridden in a train or heard a wireless broadcast.

The villagers work from sunrise till sunset, and take their relaxation in the taproom of old Fox inn, where the youngsters get excited over a "needle game" of darts.

Welsh Singers Persist

Not even the collapse of the platform on which they were standing could deter a Welsh choir which was trying for a prize at the recent Eisteddfod at Nebo, Wales. During the chief choral competition the stage gave way when the third choir had assembled on it preparatory to giving their number. The were hurled to the ground and, despite the shock and injuries, the singers tried for the prize later.

Bankers Hold Farm Conference

A "feeders' conference" was held in a state bank at Presho, South Dakota, attended by fifty farmers. The conference stressed the feeding of low price wheat and barley, and marketing it through livestock. Later, booklets on the feeding of wheat were distributed among the farmers, and a feeders column was carried in the local paper each week.

"We have had more success with the conference and with the feeders column in the local paper, than with any other undertaking we have tried," the bankers said. "As a result there is about three times as much livestock being fed out in our territory than ever before. We plan to hold other similar conferences the coming year."

The benefits of civilization exist because of the capital accumulated by those who have gone before. Through accumulation of capital our great railroads have been constructed, our public utilities have been built and our mills, office buildings and homes have arisen.

Mr. Olson Explains Mud Lake Issue

Hans Olson, owner of the Viking Telephone company was a visitor in town Sunday and, we had a very interesting talk with him in regards to Mud Lake being reclaimed for a game reserve.

Mr. Olson, who is a member of the Izaak Walton League explained several points concerning the work of the League and, told us that the people in Mud Lake should not consider the posters the Izaak Walton League put up there the time they made the trip to Thief Lake, as an insult to them or their territory.

He also stated that both those for and against the reclaiming of the lake should tell their own story in regards to why they want the lake back and others should likewise state why they want it to remain the way it is so, that their different views may be aired out and the public become better informed as to how they stand on the situation.

We are willing to publish any comment either side may wish to state and all we ask is that you sign your statement so that we may know who sends it in. Your name will be printed unless you notify us not to when you write a statement.

A Tribute to Minnesota

Bruce Barton, author of "The Man Nobody Knows," has written this tribute to Minnesota for the "Parade of the States" Monday night programs of the General Motors Corporation, part of an educational plan to make the country as a whole better acquainted with the individual states—their history, scenic beauty, industries and people.

A TIRED plane and a tired young man dropped gently out of the darkness above Le Bourget in France. A prayer of thanksgiving echoed around the world. And nations rose as one to honor a new hero, Charles A. Lindbergh.

Fitting enough this lone scout of the air should hail from Minnesota, ever a land of pioneers.

Before Columbus was born, the hardy Norsemen may have found Minnesota. Centuries later came a new race of men—French trappers, traders, explorers. They exchanged the white man's trinkets for the Indians' store of pelts. But it remained for the Puritans of two continents, from New England and Scandinavia, to clear and plough and occupy the land.

Sternly they labored. Royally the land repaid them. Today skyscrapers cut the air where cabins clustered about a trading post less than a century ago. Today automobiles stream down broad highways where yesterday the red man stalked the wary deer.

Today Minnesota goes to market with bumper crops of wheat and corn and rye, with oats and flax and potatoes. It is our biggest bread basket, our richest butter churn. Ore from its wide-spread iron mines feeds the steel mills of the nation.

Its forests yield lumber for the houses we build, the chairs we sit on, the books we read. It boasts our largest inland port. The vast streams of power of Minnesota's miles of rushing water-ways quicken great and worthy industries in the twin cities Minneapolis and Saint Paul, in Duluth and Faribault, in a score of prospering cities.

And Minnesota's children have done her signal honor. Sinclair Lewis has brought to America a coveted Nobel prize. The stirring harmonies of St. Olaf's Choir have roused the music lovers of two continents. The nation's critics pay tribute to Minneapolis' Symphony Orchestra. Two young surgeons, the dauntless brothers Mayo, pitched their practice in Minnesota and the world has made a beaten track to their door.

And nowhere in America is there more natural beauty than in this Land of the Sky Blue Water. Here are ten thousand lakes, great sheets of water ploughed by sea-going boats, quiet pools where the brown bear brings her cubs to drink. Here are miles of rolling, dipping, curving prairie. Here are tumbled hills, unbroken woodlands, the falls of Minnehaha, laughing maiden of the forest.

Come to Minnesota, of the sky-tinted waters. Come in the springtime to pluck pink mocassin, that rare and lovely orchid Minnesota calls her own. Come in the summer to match your wits in combat with a wise old trout. Come in the autumn when the deer is fleet, in the winter with your skis and snowshoes. Here you can trace the mighty Mississippi to the pool of its birth, here follow the course of rivers that flow east into the Atlantic, south to the Gulf, north into Hudson Bay.

Minnesota, star of past performance, Minnesota, star of future promise, General Motors salutes you, Star of the North!*

Marshall County Fair Attracted Large Crowd

The 26th Annual Marshall County Fair and annual summer convention of the Ninth District American Legion and Auxiliary, were held at Warren on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of this week. The fair this year was larger than ever before and the fair board is to be congratulated for securing such wonderful attractions as they had there this week.

All the free acts in front of the grandstand were of the highest class of entertainment that anyone could wish to see, and pleased the many thousand people who filled the grandstand and otherwise congregated upon the ground near the amusement platform.

The livestock exhibits were the largest in the history of the fair and the 4-H clubs held a strong line with all their fine exhibits.

The American Legion were well represented with their fine Ninth District band playing during the performance. Company M of the Minnesota National Guard gave a silent drill and the Crookston Auxiliary Drum Corps gave some fine drill exhibitions.

The Lachman Shows held full sway on the Midway and everybody had a grand time.

4-H Club Hauls In Prizes

The Holt 4-H Club again captured a whole line of prizes at the Marshall County Fair when they exhibited there this week. During the past years our local club has won prizes at the fair on their club calves and other exhibits, and this year they did better than ever, for which success their leaders are responsible to a great extent.

Stilof Anderson won first prize for showmanship. We will announce all winners next week.

Several people from here took in the Sons and Daughters of Sweden picnic at the park in Thief River Falls Sunday.

Celebrated Golden Wedding

Mr. and Mrs. August Wartenburg, pioneer settlers of this community, celebrated their Golden Wedding anniversary at their farm home north of here on Thursday evening of last week.

All of their sons and daughters were home for the occasion, and a host of friends and neighbors were there to help them celebrate.

Arvid Carlson of Middle River was master of ceremonies and several old timers gave short talks congratulating Mr. and Mrs. Wartenburg upon their fiftieth wedding anniversary.

The aged couple were given a twenty-six piece gold set in memory of the occasion.

Holt's 30-Piece Community Band and Male Quartet furnished the music and singing.

Ice Cream Social Tonight

The Nazareth Lutheran church is sponsoring an Ice Cream Social to be held on the lawn at the F. K. Fredrickson home on the C. L. Heinze farm tonight at 8 p. m. sharp.

The Holt 30-Piece Community Band will be there and give a musical concert.

Come and enjoy an evening visiting with your neighbors and friends and also hear the local band play for you.

Nox-a-Fly Co. Starts Business

Holt now has a new manufacturing company. The Nox-a-Fly Co., owned and operated by J. O. Johnson and Walter Sandberg, makes a fly spray for livestock that is guaranteed to kill all insects that pester the herds. They put it up in one gallon tins and retail it at $1.00 a gallon.

So far the company has enjoyed a brisk business, and wish to announce that if you need any insect spray to see them.

Lutheran Assembly at Thief River Falls Sunday July 3

What is expected to be one of the largest Lutheran gatherings of the year in this section will take place at Squaw Point east of Thief River Falls on Sunday, July 3, when the Northwest Lutheran assembly holds its annual outing. Rev. R. M. Fjelstad, president of the assembly announced recenty.

With the nation's birthday to be commemorated the following day the program will be of a combined religious and patriotic character. Right Rev. I. T. Aastad of Detroit Lakes, president of the Northern Minnesota district of the Norwegian Lutheran church, will conduct divine services in the morning at 11 o'clock.

In the afternoon at 3 o'clock Dr. J. N. Brown, president of Concordia college, Moorhead, will deliver a patriotic address. Musical selections also will be featured on the program: A similar event was held at Squaw Point last summer and attracted a large attendance.

Card of Thanks

We wish to thank all our kind friends for their sympathy and assistance during the illness and funeral of our little son and brother, and also for the floral offering. We also wish to thank Rev. Redal for his comforting words and also the MaleQuartet.

Bandstand Now Ready for Use

Holt not only has a great band going, but it also has a very fine bandstand. The business men of the town subscribed to a fund for building the stand, and on Monday evening the carpenters had it so nearly finished that the local band used it on Tuesday evening for their weekly concert and practice hour.

The structure is of a very fine pattern, being octagonal in shape, and is sided up and made nice and roomy for the boys.

The business men of Holt who donated to the fund that was used to build this stand for our band are to be commended for their co-operation in helping to make a success of this public enterprise.

There will be more announcements soon about what time we will have a special concert and dedicate the new stand.

Infant Dies

The angel of death crept into the happy home of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Bennes on Friday evening and claimed the life of their little infant son, only four days old. Funeral services were held on Saturday at 1 o'clock.

Interment was made in the Holt cemetery. Rev. Redal officiated.

FAITH

Nothing is impossible to the man who has faith. Faith moves mountains.

Every dark cloud has a silver lining. It is well to observe the darkness but let us not overlook the light—the bright spots. Worry sinks us deeper into our misfortunes. What is needed most is sober thought and judgment and a happy outlook upon life. Why buy misery?

Every depression is followed by a period of prosperity. Hogs, butterfat, eggs and grains have been almost valueless before. Remember, it is impossible to have profits without some losses occasionally. Happiness is all the more sweet because of some sorrow.

Let's forget our troubles with a little faith in the future and with a clear mind divorced of fear and worry we will win and be happy.

Hoover and Curtis Stand on Platform Calling for Modification of 18th Amendment—Would Let State Decide for Themselves.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

President Hoover

LET each state decide for itself whether it will be wet or dry. That, briefly, is the prohibition plank adopted by the Republican national convention in Chicago. It was dictated by President Hoover, and the administration forces, in complete control of the convention, put it over after one of the most uproarious sessions in twenty years of Republican conventions. The plank is not pleasing to the very wet Republicans and is completely obnoxious to the dry ones. Under the Republican plan congress will at all times be in general control of liquor law enforcement in those states that elect to remain dry. Also, congress will control the manufacture, sale and distribution of liquor within the borders of the wet states.

With the platform out of the way the convention proceeded to do what had been whispered in some quarters they might do. They renominated Herbert Hoover for President and Charles C. Curtis for Vice President.

The debate on the prohibition plank was the only thing that saved this convention from being a complete flop as far as thrills and excitement are concerned. In all other respects it was about as tame as a town meeting, the selection of standard bearers being a foregone conclusion. James R. Garfield, chairman of the resolutions committee, led the fight for the Hoover plank, while Senator Bingham and Nicholas Murray Butler headed the forces demanding a plank insisting on the repeal of the Eighteenth amendment.

Senator Bingham's plank was defeated by a vote of 681 to 472. An analysis of the vote shows that the Republicans in the south swung the balance against the northern, eastern and middle western states which furnish the bulk of the electoral votes for the election of Republican Presidents.

The Hoover plank as adopted reads in part as follows:

"We do not favor a submission limited to the issue of retention or repeal. For the American nation never in its history has gone backward, and in this case the progress which has been thus far made must be preserved, while the evils must be eliminated.

"We, therefore, believe that the people should have an opportunity to pass upon a proposed amendment the provision of which, while retaining the federal government power to preserve the gains already made in dealing with the evils inherent in the liquor traffic, shall allow states to deal with the problem as their citizens may determine, but subject always to the power of the federal government to protect those states where prohibition may exist and safeguard our citizens everywhere from the return of the saloon and its attendant abuses.

"Such an amendment should be promptly submitted to the states by congress, to be acted upon by state conventions called for that sole purpose in accordance with the provisions of Article V of the Constitution, and adequately safeguarded so as to be truly representative."

The entire platform, as submitted by the resolutions committee, was adopted by a viva voce vote. Some of the high lights follow:

- Approval given an emergency relief fund for loans to states in need. No direct federal relief to individuals.
- Shorter work week, shorter work day, legislation to stimulate home building, continuance of restricted immigration.
- Prompt and drastic reduction of public expenditure urged.
- Further aid pledged through federal farm board, protective tariff duties, assistance to solve problems of controlling production.
- Full protection to incapacitated veterans pledged. Cash payment of bonus not mentioned.
- Favor extension of tariff protection to natural resource industries.
- Committed to maintenance of navy on basis of parity with any nation. Opposed to further army personnel reduction.
- American entry into league court favored. Settlement of international difficulties without "alliances or foreign partnerships" pledged.
- Rigid laws favored to stamp out activities of gangsters, racketeers and kidnapers.
- Relentless warfare pledged against narcotic traffic.
- Need cited for revision of banking laws on sounder basis.
- Retention of gold standard pledged. Participation in international conferences on monetary questions.
- Existing status of government in Hawaii should be maintained.
- President's "constructive program" lauded as an attack on the depression with "far-reaching objectives, but entailing no danger to the budget."
- Republican control of the federal government will "insure the orderly recovery of the country."

WHILE the Republicans were busy in Chicago, the Democrats made small progress in settling their preconvention squabbles. One development was the rumor, originating in Chicago, that Melvin A. Traylor, the banker who is one of the dark horse possibilities for the Presidential nomination, might be put on the Roosevelt ticket in second place. It was said the New York governor would welcome this move. The Traylor campaign managers seemed to think the better ticket would be "Traylor and Roosevelt."

Support of the nominee, whoever he may be, was pledged by leaders of the party in a united appeal for completion of the party's $1,500,000 victory fund before the opening of the national convention on June 27. The message to the rank and file was signed by Alfred E. Smith, Gov. Franklin Roosevelt, Jouett Shouse, Owen D. Young, Newton D. Baker, former Gov. James M. Cox, John W. Davis and 54 other leaders.

TRAGEDY stepped in to halt the debate on Representative Wright Patman's soldier bonus bill when Representative E. Eslick (Dem., Tenn.), dropped dead on the floor of the house while making an impassioned plea for the immediate payment of the $2,400,000,000 bonus. Shocked by the dramatic turn of events, the house adjourned immediately as a mark of respect.

Wright Patman

Mr. Eslick had about half completed a ten-minute speech in behalf of the bonus. Picturing the World war army as "the flower of the country's manhood," he waved aside questions of finance and said:

"Mr. Speaker, I want to divert from the sordid—"

He never finished the sentence. As he collapsed, he clutched at a table and partially broke his fall. Dr. George W. Calver, Capitol physician, said he had died before he struck the floor. Mrs. Eslick was in the members' gallery at the time.

Tragedy added to futility is the history of this bonus bill. Hours of debate, largely for home consumption, wasted on a measure that was foredoomed before it was presented.

Though it passed the house by a vote of 211 to 176, there was no possible chance that the senate would pass it, and President Hoover had announced that he would veto it if it should be passed.

FRANZ VON PAPEN, Germany's new aristocratic chancellor, held several conferences with the premiers of the states and the German agricultural council and succeeded in part in allaying their fears that his government intended eventually to overthrow the republic. He assured them solemnly that his rule would be "based entirely on the constitution of the reich," and denied that his cabinet was unsocial or reactionary. The dissolution of the reichstag and the calling of elections were thought necessary, he said, to a new unified expression of the national will, and it was his belief "that a new parliament will more readily produce a clear-cut majority for a policy of spiritual and ethical rehabilitation and an economic orientation that shall rest on Christian, national and social foundations."

Franz von Papen

WITHOUT debate the senate adopted a resolution presented by Senator Joe T. Robinson, Democratic floor leader, calling on the President to specify how and where additional savings were to be accomplished. The resolution was introduced in answer to President Hoover's demand that congress save $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 more.

In some quarters, the prediction was made that the need for additional budget balancing funds will serve to revive the sales tax, notwithstanding the fact that the billion dollar tax bill already has been enacted into law.

The conference committee, still wrestling with the economy bill, has come to a virtual agreement on the plan for enforced furloughs for federal employees, instead of the 10 per cent pay cut plan.

Never Positive Proof That Atlantis Existed

According to ancient tradition, Atlantis was the name of a large island or continent which existed at a very early period in the Atlantic ocean, and eventually was sank beneath the waves.

An account of it is given by Plato. His writings state that in the Atlantic ocean, over against the pillars of Hercules, there was once an island which was larger than Asia and Africa together (or the then existent notion of the extent of these continents), and near it lay other islands through which there was a passage to a large continent beyond.

Nine thousand years before Plato's time, said the tradition, the island of Atlantis was thickly settled and very powerful. It held sway over Africa as far as Egypt and over a large part of Europe, but the advance of its conquering power was checked by the valor of the Greeks. At last, during a violent earthquake, which lasted a day and a night and was accompanied by inundations of the ocean, the island was wholly submerged. The account adds that many years thereafter, the sea in this part was unnavigable because of the shoals caused by the sunken lands.

This ancient legend may, and probably did, have some historical circumstances for foundation, but what these were no historian has ever been able to determine.

Score One for Horse

Something new in nature-study stories comes from North Queensland. A peaceful old nag was browsing by the roadside, perhaps pondering on the difficulties of earning a carrot in these days of motor transport, when a motorcycle with a pillion-rider ran into him. The horse was knocked down but to the utter astonishment of the cyclists, who had also taken a toss, he deliberately rose, bared his teeth, and waded into them and the machine. The latter will never compete with horse labor again; the cyclists, considerably knocked about, had to find refuge behind a stiff three-railed fence while the infuriated animal—obviously a cavalry brigadier's charger at one period of his existence—told them what he thought of them from the other side.—The Bulletin, Sydney.

The greatest thrill a mother can know

HER BABY . . . thriving . . . gaining by leaps and bounds! His back, strong and fine as a little champion's. His teeth developing perfectly. His legs straight and sturdy. His skin rosy, his flesh firm, his whole body a living promise of health—radiant, buoyant health—through the years to come!

Can any food except Nature's food build such a baby? Millions of mothers have answered Yes to this question. And now more emphatically still a world-famous clinic answers Yes.

Living proof—in millions of healthy babies

Seventy-five years ago, Gail Borden gave Eagle Brand to the mothers of America. Today, Eagle Brand—second only to mother's milk in easy digestibility—is known as a wonderful infant food the world over. Eagle Brand has raised more healthy babies than any other food, excepting mother's milk. In practically every community are healthy, sturdy boys and girls, and men and women who got their start in life on Eagle Brand. In your own community, see how these Eagle Brand ex-babies compare.

What the scientists discovered

But newer still is the news from the world-famous baby clinic. Two physicians fed a group of 50 average babies on Eagle Brand for a period of several months—checking with care every detail of their health and growth. Bone structure. Tooth development. Weight and height gains. Blood count . . . And those 50 Eagle Brand babies, judged by every known test, proved themselves superbly nourished!

HERBERT HOOVER FOR PRESIDENT

G. O. P. BIG SHOW AT CHICAGO WAS A MASTERPIECE

Greatest Interest Centered in Fight Over Prohibition Repeal Plank.

By WRIGHT A. PATTERSON

Chicago.—The Republican convention met, nominated Herbert Hoover as the party's candidate for President, and Charles Curtis as its candidate for Vice President, adopted a platform that embodies a modification of the prohibition amendment to the states as one plank, and adjourned.

That is what was accomplished by 1,153 delegates—Senator Borah not being present—and 1,154 alternates, who traveled in going to and from the convention an estimated total distance of 2,308,000 miles at a cost for railroad fare of something over $46,000.

So far as the actual news of the convention was concerned any reporter—even the cub—could have written it at any time during the past three months and possibly at any time during the past three years. But there had to be a convention, the properly designated delegates had to have their day in the spotlight, even though there was no contest for votes for a Presidential nomination and all had to pay their own railroad fare and hotel bills. Members of the national committee had to have the opportunity of sitting in the reserved seats at the big show. Distinguished guests had to have the opportunity of being known as distinguished guests. The assistant sergeants-at-arms and the ushers would never have been satisfied had they been deprived of wearing their badges, and even the peanut venders had to have their chance to earn an honest dime.

The Nominations Are Made.

When the roll call of states for the naming of candidates began on Thursday the California delegation was the first one to respond and James Scott presented the name of Herbert Hoover. His naming of the President produced the greatest demonstration of the convention. When Oregon was reached the name of Doctor France was presented to be followed by the one ballot needed to name a candidate. President Hoover received all the votes with the exception of three or four for Coolidge, three for France, three for Blaine, of Wisconsin, and one for Senator Wadsworth, of New York.

Doctor France proved a magnanimous candidate for the nomination. After L. R. Sandblast, of Portland, Ore., had presented in a modest way the qualifications of his state's champion for the Presidential job, Doctor France attempted to secure recognition from the chair, and when refused attempted to force his way onto the platform. The audience presumed he wanted to say something more in his own behalf, but that was not the good doctor's purpose. What he wanted to do was to withdraw his own name and present to the convention the name of the distinguished Massachusetts trout fisherman, Calvin Coolidge. The police took a hand in the affair, ejected the doctor from the platform, and the name of Calvin Coolidge was not mentioned except that during the roll call for the Presidential nomination three or four delegates from as many states insisted upon voting for him.

With General Dawes out of the race there was practically no opposition to Vice President Curtis, and he received the nomination for second place on the ticket on the first ballot.

The Formalities Begin.

Tuesday morning at 11 o'clock there were close to one hundred thousand people milling about OUTside the Chicago Stadium. Inside, there were some fifteen thousand to occupy 20,700 seats. In the section reserved for delegates there was but one vacant chair, the one reserved for Senator Borah. In the alternate section they were all filled. The national committeemen and women were all present, the distinguished guests had arrived, the assistant sergeants at arms, all properly labeled with pretty badges, were in evidence, but all too many of that more than 7,000 seats provided for paying guests, at from $3 to $5 per guest, were vacant. The people of Chicago had failed to evidence their appreciation of the entertainment provided by a national Republican convention.

It was only 18 minutes after the scheduled hour of eleven when Senator Fess, national chairman, with a bung starter for a gavel, called for order and announced to those who persisted in continuing their conversation, that their time was up, and he was now in charge and would temporarily, at least, run the show. Ordinarily the next number on the program would have been the prayer, but before that in this case they must get through with the welcome by the Democratic mayor of the city. It would never do to include in the plea for Divine guidance, the actions or words of a Democratic mayor.

The keynoter, Hon. Lester Jesse Dickinson, of Iowa, made a good speech. The same quality of speech made before a Democratic national convention would have produced hours of boisterous demonstration, but the Republicans are more given to voting than to shouting. Though Senator Dickinson's speech did not produce any number of wild outbursts, any prolonged parade of howling delegates, it did make a profound impression on the assembled Republican hosts.

While looking on at a Republican national convention seems like watching the operations of a well oiled and perfectly geared machine, it is not as simple as it seems. Jones and Smith and Brown and Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler all have a chance to air their views, but all of this is in committee meetings held in hotel rooms. It is the final result that is brought to the floor of the convention and goes into the record as the unanimous verdict of the assembled delegates.

The Wednesday morning session was another of those formal occasions that did not attract the crowd. It took ten minutes to listen to the report of the organization committee and an hour to listen to the speech of the permanent chairman, Representative Snell, of New York. But it was a good speech and appealed to the delegates. His first mention of the name of President Hoover started a half hour demonstration that would have been unanimous had Oregon joined in. But that state was loyal to former Senator France, of Maryland, the adopted favorite of Oregon, and its banner was not carried in the parade of states.

Chicago Sees the Show.

Chicago went to the convention Wednesday night, and Chicago was wet. When Senator Bingham, of Connecticut, read the minority platform report, demanding straight repeal of the Eighteenth amendment, the thunderous applause came from those $3 to $5 seats the Chicago people had paid for and the assistant sergeants at arms. The rather mild delegate demonstration was led by Wisconsin, and joined in by many states, including prohibition Maine. When previously the majority report was presented, providing for modification, with federal control of the liquor traffic, Kansas led the demonstration, but did not receive any appreciable support from the Chicago audience.

Wednesday night it looked like a convention. The vacant seats that had been so noticeable during the Tuesday and Wednesday morning sessions, were all filled. All of the Chicago aunts and uncles and cousins, Republican and Democratic, had turned out to hear what the G. O. P. was going to do about prohibition, and these Chicago aunts, uncles and cousins knew what they wanted done with it. When James R. Garfield of Ohio attempted to make a plea for the adoption of the majority plank, Chicago, in the galleries, refused to listen. Even a threat to clear the galleries was of no avail, and very little of what Mr. Garfield said was heard by any of the delegates to whom he was talking.

Dr. Butler in the Limelight.

Chicago thought differently about Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler when he had his ten minutes on the platform. The gallery gods recognized him as their champion and the threat to adjourn the convention was not needed to secure attention to his speech.

When Ogden Mills of New York told the vast audience why he favored the majority report, the gallery gods listened. They had to. His powerful voice over-awed them and demanded attention. Altogether those gallery gods did much to counteract the good impression made by the gracious welcome extended to the delegates by Democratic Mayor Cermak.

Speech followed speech, starting with a time limit of ten minutes and getting down to one minute, until every one who wanted to have his say had been given an opportunity. It was such a talk-fest as would have been expected at a national Democratic pow-wow, but the oratory lasting until one o'clock Thursday morning, did not change a single vote, and when the roll of states was called it resulted in the adoption of the majority report by 462 to 631.

Platform and Prohibition.

The party platform as worked out by the resolutions committee contains 28 planks. When it was read to the convention on Wednesday evening the delegates, and especially the wet Chicago visitors, evinced interest in only one of the 28. There was but little interest in the fact that the party stood for a reorganization of the government bureaus in the interest of economy; that the party proposed to have the government loan money to the states for emergency relief work; that it stood for a reduction of public expenditures; for the balancing of the national budget; for adherence to the gold standard and against currency inflation; for revision of the banking laws to protect depositors; for continuing assistance to co-operatives through the farm marketing act, but when the secretary, after an hour, got down to that one vital, all important subject, prohibition, they were interested.

© HARRIS & EWING

CHARLES CURTIS

The majority of the resolutions committee proposed a plank that would modify the Eighteenth amendment permitting people of any state to decide for themselves whether they wished to be dry or wet. If dry the federal government to assist in the prevention of the manufacture of liquor in the state, or transportation into or the sale of liquor within the state. If wet the federal government to control and regulate the sale of liquor within the state. It implied that government control and regulation would be through the medium of government dispensaries to be established in wet territories only.

Other planks call for tax reduction; for a flexible tariff and the extension of tariff protection to cover natural resource industries, farms, forests, mines and oil wells; for a shorter work day and shorter work week, restriction of immigration, collective bargaining, freedom of speech and assemblage; for a home loan discount bank system; for giving the federal power commission authority to regulate charges for electric current when transmitted between states, and others that are usually found in any party platform.

Spotlights and Observations.

If all of those wearing assistant sergeant-at-arms badges vote the Republican ticket next November, Mr. Hoover is sure of election.

"welcome to the g. o. p., ANTON J. CERMAK, Mayor," was the message carried on the arm of every city policeman on duty in and around the Stadium.

Alice Roosevelt Longworth was much the lion of the occasion of the women, but Will Rogers got the majority of the attention from the women. At every session the women crashed the gates of the press stand seeking Will's autograph, and he signed until he developed a severe case of writer's cramp and wore out all of his lead pencils.

Think of it! $3.49 Buys a First-Choice Tire

Unlucky Dogs

One of the unluckiest things that can happen to a breed of dogs is to get fashionable, says the Cleveland Press. This means that the dogs will be transplanted in huge numbers from their natural environments to over-heated apartments. It means in many cases, that hardy animals bred to hunt and fight will have to eat chocolates and sleep on silk pillows.

One of the popular breeds these days is the Scotch terrier. Certainly a rugged, warm-coated, tough-fibered outdoor dog if there ever was one. Yet—believe it or not—full-grown Scotch terriers may be seen on the streets of Cleveland wearing knitted sweaters on cold days. Think of the humiliation!

Silent Lancashire Clogs

Another new trade has come to Lancashire, in the wake of a new fashion. It is the making, and the wearing, of the silent clog. Once every cotton town was filled with the clatter of the wooden clogs of the millworkers as the irons with which they were shod clanged on the pavements. Now clogs are being made again in this time of economy, shod with rubber instead of iron. The millworker has taken back her old footwear, but goes to her looms on silent feet. Even postmen and policemen are using the new clog.

Noses and Ayes

"Now if you will count noses—"

"Never mind noses," said the speaker. "We'll count the ayes."

The Compliment

Sister—George declares I have a perfect rosebud of a mouth.

Brother—A beautiful compliment, indeed, considering rosebuds are usually closed.

Menace to life is everywhere in the big city. Yet the city man is more scared when he is all alone in a house in the country.

Stilof Anderson Wins Car

Stilof Anderson, son of Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Anderson of Holt won the new Chevrolet six coach given away as grand prize at the Marshall County Fair on Wednesday. We feel proud to see a nice young man like Stilof get the car as we know that he will take good care of it and also use it in getting around in 4-H Club work.

Several hundred people from this vicinity attended the County Fair and American Legion Convention at Warren this week. The weather was ideal for the occasion and the people enjoyed it very much.

H. B. Young, local postmaster who has spent a week in a hospital in Thief River Falls, returned here on Friday and is now making his home with Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert Sanoden and family.

Card of Thanks

We wish to express our heartfelt thanks for the kindness shown us during the sickness and death of our beloved wife and sister. We also wish to express thanks to Rev. Redal for his kind words and also the male quartet for their songs.

WORKS FOUR YEARS ON STATUE OF ABE LINCOLN AT AGE OF 21

Head of "Boy Lincoln," created by Paul Manship, with medallions, typifying traits in the Emancipator's character — fortitude, patriotism, justice and charity. These will ornament the base of the heroic bronze to be unveiled at Fort Wayne, Ind., by the Lincoln National Life Foundation this summer. This is the first statue depicting Lincoln as a youth.

Lincoln National Life Foundation to Dedicate Paul Manship Bronze at Fort Wayne, Ind., This Summer.

Paul Manship

Abraham Lincoln as a youth will be shown for the first time to the world in a beautiful bronze statue when it is erected this summer at Fort Wayne, Ind., by the Lincoln National Life Foundation. This will be in contrast to the "Bearded Lincolns" which form the theme for most of the fifty other Lincoln statues in various parts of the United States. The Hoosier heroic statue will depict the Emancipator as he looked at the age of twenty-one, just before he left Indiana, where he had spent 14 years of his boyhood days.

Paul Manship, noted sculptor of New York and Paris, has been working four years on the project in research and the mechanics of modeling the statue that it might give a realistic picture of the youthful Lincoln. No photographs of Lincoln in this period were available, so his personal appearance at the time he reached his majority in 1830 could only be visualized by a careful study of the traditions and personal testimonies which have come down to us from his contemporaries. Mr. Manship collaborated with Dr. Louis A. Warren, director of the Foundation.

Mr. Manship is now in Brussels, Belgium, where he is supervising the completion of the statue. It will be finished in time to be shipped in sections to the United States for the erection and dedication this summer at Fort Wayne.

Portrays Lincoln as Youth.

The statue represents Lincoln as a youth, leaning easily and naturally against a stump in the simple costume of the frontier. As was his custom, he has a dog by his side, typifying his love for animals, an ax modeled after his own particular one, symbolizing him as the rail splitter, and in his hand a book signifying inspirational thought. On each face of the pedestal is to be a group of heroic figures in medallion form, done with typical Manship technique, representing some of the qualities for which the name of Lincoln stands—patriotism, justice, fortitude and charity. The heroic statue, classical in feeling, will rise on its pedestal and plinth to a height of 24 feet.

When Mr. Manship was given the task four years ago, he was told by the Lincoln National Life Foundation to produce an outstanding creation of art which would be one of the recognized monuments of the world. With Dr. Warren of the Foundation, Mr. Manship made a long trip through the country of Lincoln's youth. The Ohio river and reminders of the old ferryboat days and glimpses of the Kentucky homestead of his childhood excited the sculptor's imagination. He read every authority of note on Lincoln.

After completing all his research, Mr. Manship started actual work on the statue in May, 1929, spending six months in his Paris studio and six months in his New York studio. Three enlargements were made. Two were made mechanically in Paris and the third and final last summer. From this enlargement the cast is now being completed in Brussels.

Wool Pool Finishes Season's Business

The local wool pool of the Minnesota Wool Growers Association with concentration point at Thief River Falls, wound up its activities for this season in that city on Thursday of last week according to an announcement made here by R. J. Lund, manager of the local pool.

Mr. Lund stated that the pool handled 353,292 pounds of wool this year as compared to about 308,000 pounds last year or an increase of 45,000 pounds for the season of Minnesota wool.

Alex Huddleston, president of the Minnesota Wool Growers association stated when he was at Thief River Falls that the local pool had handled more wool at this point to date than any other pool belonging to the state association.

W. T. Grout, licensed grader from Boston, who graded all the wool at Thief River Falls went to Fargo to grade North Dakota wool.

Mr. Lund also stated that the local pool handled 15,170 pounds of North Dakota wool which was shipped in there from Grand Forks, making the total pounds handled at the Thief River Falls concentration point 368,462 lbs. for the season of 1932.

Begin Oiling Highway

The State Highway department have the past week been oiling Highway 33 between Warren and Thief River Fall, commencing the work late last week from Thief River going west.

According to a report received here from the department division officials in Crookston they expect to start in soon to regravel and oil Highway 32 from Holt to Thief River Falls.

Several families gathered at the Skomedal park to spend the 4th.

BLANKET YOUR CREAM----
A Wet One in Summer and a Dry One in Winter
A sudden change of temperature, too far up or too far down, is a poor thing for cream.
When delivering cream in the summer, it is good business to wet a blanket and cover up the cans. This will enable you to deliver your cream cool and sweet. Likewise, in freezing weather, wrap the cans in a dry blanket to keep the cream from freezing, as freezing impairs the quality of your cream.

Appointed Rural Credit Head

Haldor P. Nygaard, Halstad, operator of a large farm in Norman county, was appointed chairman of the Minnesota Rural Credit Bureau last week by Governor Floyd B. Olson.

He succeeds C. F. Gaarenstroom, Fairmont, who resigned effective July 1.

The new head of the bureau is vice president of the Land O' Lakes group, district 14, is secretary of the Halsted Cooperative Telephone Exchange and is treasurer and director of the Halstad Cooperative Elevator company. He has been a member of the local school board since 1897, and is local appraiser for the rural credit bureau at the present time.

Nygaard operates a farm of 750 acres, part in Norman county in Minnesota and part in North Dakota.

C. G. SELVIG

The primary election gave some of the candidates who had filed for congressmen at large a close call. Selvig was among those that were renominated and is holding eighth place on the list.

The following were nominated on the Republican ticket: Christianson, Chase, Nolan, Burnquist, Harold Knutson, Holmberg, Pittenger, Selvig, Adresen.

Auto Collision

The first auto collision to take place here between cars driven thru on the highway and local trafic, happened on Saturday when Johnny Ness misjudged the speed of a car coming in from the south on the highway as he went to cross it on Main street.

The car coming on the highway was a Chev sedan driven by one of the Wartenburg boys from Middle River who was coming so fast thru town that he could not stop and, the Ford driven by Ness hit him in the side crushing a fender. The Ford was not just square with the world after the smashup but the boys had it fixed that same night and put it on the road again.

After the accident both parties argued the point as to who was to blame and neither one got any satisfaction so they pulled out for home.

Mr. and Mrs. O. E. Sovde and son Lowell, Herb and Verna Johnson returned home Tuesday from Bemidji where they had spent three days at the lake.

Obituary

Grace Richardson, daughter of Robert and Emily Richardson, was born in Lone Rock, Wis., December 1, 1867, and died at Holt, Minn., June 15, 1932, at the age of 64 years, 6 months and 15 days.

In her early teens she moved with her parents to Kimball, S. D. While there she united with the Methodist Episcopal church. In the year 1894 the family moved to Ionia, Iowa. and since there was no church of her chosen denomination there, she united with the Congregational church.

She was united in marriage in 1905 with Henry B. Young. In 1914 they moved to Holt, Minn., where they lived until death claimed her. Both husband and wife were active in church work wherever they lived. In Holt they organized a Sunday school and carried on the work until failing health compelled them to lay it aside. Mrs. Young assisted her husband in publishing the local newspaper. She was a charter member of the Holt chapter of the W. C. T. U. organized eleven years ago. The work of the Union lay close to her heart and she took an active faithful part in the work. Those who are left to mourn her death besides her husband are her sister, Mrs. S. B. Nichols, Clarksville, Iowa, and two brothers, W. E. Richardson also of Clarksville, Iowa, and H.E. Richardson of Yucaipa, California, besides a host of friends who will greatly miss her.

A brief service was held in Holt, and the remains were then taken to the home of the sister, Mrs. S. B. Nichols, in Clarksville, Iowa. A service was conducted there on Saturday, June 18, by Rev. E. A. Sabin of the Clarksville Community church. Burial was made in Greenwood Cemetery in Nashua, Iowa.

N. S. A. News

Students attending the Northwest school are offered unusual opportunities in music, with three members of the faculty giving instruction in piano, voice, violin, and orchestra.

Miss Rose Polski, who has been in charge of piano work for the past six years, will return again at the opening of the fall term. She is one of the most accomplished pianists in the northwest, having won highest honors at the Chicago Musical College some few years ago in competition with other students representing practically every state in the Union.

In discussing the piano work offered at the Northwest School, Miss Polski states, "Ample opportunity is given piano students to expand instrumental experience. The school auditorium is equipped with a Steinway Grand, while a number of pianos are provided for practice work."

The work in voice is given by Mrs. Roy W. Hollander, who also directs the school orchestra. Mrs Hollander received much favorable comment following her presentation of the school operetta, "Oh, Doctor" last year, and "Sunbonnet Sue" one year ago.

Miss Grace Warne will again take charge of instruction in violin. According to Miss Warne, the violin is one of the hardest instruments to master, but it has always been the favorite of many people because of the close resemblance of its beautiful tones to those of the human voice.

New Postal Tax

A tax of one cent per ounce on first class mail went into effect on Wednesday this week according to official instruction received by Gilbert Sanoden, acting postmaster.

This in effect makes the rate on letters 3 cents instead of two cents. The law will be in effect until July 1, 1934. A new stock of three cent stamps has been received for use on the letters. The rate on post cards was not raised. They will remain at one cent.

Air mail rates for letters were also increased on July 6. The first ounce will be eight cents and additional ounces thirteen cents. The previous rate was 5 cents for the first ounce and 10 cetts for each additional ounce.

The rate of postage for the publishers has also been increased. No change in parcel post rates will be made until October 1, 1932, when an adjustment will take place. It is not an increase in parcel post rates but a revision, in some cases lower and in some zones higher.

Elected Commander of Ninth District American Legion

Oscar F. Smith of Thief River Falls, was elected commander of the Ninth District American Legion to succeed W. C. Sumpmann of Crookston at the closing business session of the annual convention held in connection with the Marshall County Fair at Warren last week.

WARNING!

If you want to keep your car and life both intact, then take notice now and, from now on stop before you enter the new state highway in town. They had a collision here Saturday but no one was hurt.

The reason that the village has not put up a stop sign is, because they have no ordinance for prosecuting any one who may violate the rules and not stop and, because they do not feel that they should protect the public on the highway who are speeding thru here at the rate of from 50 to 70 miles an hour.

If you follow the traffic law you will have no trouble and to play safe stop first.

What we want to do now is to stop all speeding here and to do so we are going to have a state patrol stationed here. We are also going to ask the state highway department to put up stop signs and then if you are in the wrong you will be taken to court to settle the matter.

FAITH
Nothing is impossible to the man who has faith. Faith moves mountains.
Every dark cloud has a silver lining. It is well to observe the darkness but let us not overlook the light—the bright spots. Worry sinks us deeper into our misfortunes. What is needed most is sober thought and judgment and a happy outlook upon life. Why buy misery?
Every depression is followed by a period of prosperity. Hogs, butterfat, eggs and grains have been almost valueless before. Remember, it is impossible to have profits without some losses occasionally. Happiness is all the more sweet because of some sorrow.
Let's forget our troubles with a little faith in the future and with a clear mind divorced of fear and worry we will win and be happy.

The Desert's Price

By WILLIAM MacLEOD RAINE

SYNOPSIS

Drawn by the desert signal of distress, Wilson McCann, young Arizona ranchman, finds an old friend, Jim Yerby, with a broken leg. Julia Stark, daughter of Matthew Stark, inveterate enemy of the McCanns, signaled and is rendering first aid. Taking a note from Julia to her father, Wilson is fired on by Jasper, Julia's brother. Stark, Sr., expresses disbelief of Wilson's account of the shooting. On the way from Yerby's place to her home, Julia learns her companion's identity and dismisses him in anger, the old feud rankling. Ann Gifford, sheep rancher, and on that account unpopular with the cattlemen, turns down Wilson's offer of help.

His glance picked up the figure of a young girl in the doorway, a soft round little person with dimpled cheeks in and out of which the pink could pour at the least excuse. The mouth was childishly sweet, the hair abundant and fluffy. Men instinctively grew tender and protective when they looked at shy-eyed Ethel Gifford.

Again McCann bowed, this time to the girl in the doorway.

Ann faced him, inflexibly hostile. She did not speak.

"Well, so long."

Jim-Dandy felt the rein on his neck and turned toward the trail. From the ridge above McCann looked down on the low buildings of the sheep ranch. Ethel was still standing where he had last seen her. She seemed to him a lonely and pathetic figure robbed of the joys of youth.

Yerby was inclined to be querulous.

"Doc's been worryin' for fear you wouldn't come, boy. What's been keepin' you?"

"Had to fix a fence. Pedro bring my roll an' some grub last night?"

"Sure did. Well, son, now you're here make yorese'f to home."

Wilson turned Jim-Dandy into the corral. He saddled Doctor Sanders' horse and brought it to the door.

"Yore hoss is served, Doc," McCann called in. "Course I don't aim to drag you away from any hammered-down li'l runt you may have for a patient. Take yore time. He can't more'n talk an arm off you."

The old-timer snorted. "Ever see the beat of them kids, Doc? They don't know sic' 'em, an' they don't want to learn from them that does know."

Doctor Sanders laughed. He knew Yerby enjoyed rough repartee. "You act like a pair of kids, if you ask me. Don't forget to give Jim one of these powders every four hours, Wils." He added his "So long" and bustled out to the horse.

Before he left, McCann offered a suggestion. He did not quite know the spring of the impulse that impelled it. "Wisht you wouldn't say anything about that gunplay at Tincup pass, Doc. No use startin' trouble before it has to come."

Sanders assented.

McCann's eyes followed him as he dipped into the arroyo that would bring him to the mesa upon which was the sheep ranch. The young man smiled ruefully. He was thinking about the Gifford sisters.

It seemed to him that their lives were involved in tragedy. Why should they be pariahs, outcasts from the society of those living near? What had they done to deserve it? That they ran sheep was an unfortunate incident and had nothing to do with what they were. No wonder Ann had become embittered at the destiny that pressed upon them. Nora had vanished, the bloom brushed from her life, if the dark rumors he heard were true. But his thoughts dwelt on Ethel, so unfit to cope with the harshness of this dry and cruel land.

CHAPTER III

Wils McCann Uses His Quirt

On the porch in front of Basford's emporium, which was also the post office, Mesa and the adjoining country met to discuss the news and formulate views.

Today conversation was engrossing but guarded. For the feud between the Starks and the McCanns had broken out again. During the night a cabin far from the main ranch house of the Flying VY, had been raided and burned by armed horsemen. Two punchers had been sleeping there, and in trying to escape through the window one had been wounded. He had slipped away into the chaparral and hidden. After daybreak his companion had brought help from the Flying VY and carried him to the ranch.

Peter McCann, two of his sons, and his foreman, Wes Tapscott, were in town. They had come in force, so the story ran, to find out what the sheriff intended to do about it.

Curt Quinn, to two safe friends confidentially summed up public opinion. "Old man McCann ain't expectin' Hank to do anything. I don't reckon Hank got elected sheriff to pick a row with the Starks. He won't look oncet at the Circle Cross ranch, an' I don't blame him. Nor old Pete won't blame him either. He come to the law to make the proper bluff, but he'd be plumb disappointed if it interfered in his own little private feud. The McCanns will play out the hand their own selves."

The town looked with respect and awe upon the four lean brown men who dismounted at the sheriff's office. All of them carried rifles as well as side arms. Peter, hard-eyed and imperious, a fighter from his youth, asked no odds of any man. If he was a leader it was not by chance, but by reason of the dominant force in him. Hawk-nosed and shaggy-browed, the chief of the McCanns bore in his face the look of heady and ungovernable temper. One glance at the three was enough to show from whom his lithe and keen-eyed sons had inherited.

"Chips of the old block, Wils an' Lyn are—about as tough propositions to bump into as a fellow's liable to meet," Simp Shell commented as he watched the four riders leave the sheriff's office. He was a middle-aged man with no business except everybody's business. "Except the old man. He's got a leetle the edge of the boys yet. When he gets on the hook I ce'tainly want to be lookin' for a tree to climb."

"How about exceptin' Matt Stark an' them Texans, Stone an' Gitner?" Basford murmured significantly.

"They's no pilgrims," admitted Simp.

The quartette of riders swung from the saddles and grounded the reins. Peter McCann nodded grimly to those on the porch and walked into the store. Tapscott followed him. The others stayed to exchange a word with Quinn and Shell.

Lyn sat on his heels and from his hip pocket drew the "makings." There was nothing to show he was not at perfect ease with the world—except the long rifle he had just propped against the wall. He was a good-looking lad, just turned twenty, slender and graceful as one of Praxiteles' models.

The talk drifted. Then from out of the store came Peter McCann with a square of wrapping paper, a hammer, and some tacks. To the wall he nailed the coarse paper. Those on the porch watched him silently and read the notice roughly printed there.

REWARD
For information identifying
All or any of the Night Riders who Shot Joe Walters at the Cass Cabin
Will be paid by PETER McCANN.

This called for comment. After a long moment of waiting Quinn spoke. "How is Joe?"

"He'll make it, Doc says."

"Good. He's one tough customer, Joe is. I kinda figured he'd fool 'em. Nell was allowin' to ride over today on' see if they was anything she could do."

"Not a thing, Curt. But tell her much obliged."

That was all. McCann's spurs jingled down the steps. His sons and his foreman followed. They swung into their saddles and rode away.

"Short an' sudden," commented Simp. "The old man don't orate much, but his actions talk mighty loud. I notice he ain't offerin' no reward for the arrest an' conviction of them night riders. Not none. He aims to do all the arrestin' that's needed an' he don't reckon any convictin' will be required."

Quinn nodded. He was of the same opinion. McCann would go his own way, regardless of the law. If anyone protested he could point out how he had first appealed to it for protection. But there would be a grim ironic light in his eyes when he mentioned the fact.

The McCanns had not been out of Mesa ten minutes when another group of horsemen were seen approaching by the Tincup Pass road in a cloud of dust. They drew up in front of the Gilt Edge saloon.

Jasper Stark straddled into the gambling house, his brother Phil and Carl Gitner at his heels. Stone stood on the porch and looked round leisurely in his cool measured way before he passed through the door into the Gilt Edge. Killer he might be, but he was an individual first. He did not follow at any man's beck.

"Come an' wash the dust outa yore throat, Dave," invited Jasper, in no subdued voice. "It's on me today. Bet yore boots."

Stone's cold blue eyes looked at Jasper with no warmth in them. As a boy the Texan had ridden with Mosby in his border raids. There were rumors that at one time he had been one of Quantrell's guerillas. The habit of his life was to consort with danger. It seemed to him child's play and worse, an indication of arrant weakness, to wear such a manner of exuberant triumph as Jasper Stark displayed. What had they done but drive two frightened cowpunchers into the chaparral, wound one, and fire an empty cabin? If the faction with which he was allied called this a victory there would surely be trouble ahead. The McCanns were fighters.

"I wouldn't choose to drink," he said.

"Different here," retorted Jasper. "Set 'em up, Hans. The lid's off today."

The older of the Stark brothers was large and muscular, but he carried himself slouchily. His physical strength was not convincing because it had back of it no mental or moral force. The younger man was of a different type. Phil was only eighteen, but he had been brought up in the school of the frontier which has no vacations. Stone judged that he would go through when the call came.

The Gilt Edge was the usual resort of the Stark faction as the Legal Tender was of the other side. Hans now gave information to Jasper as he set out glasses and bottles.

"The McCanns wass in town today already yet."

Jasper stopped, glass poised.

"How many of 'em?"

"Four. Old Peter, Tapscott, andt two of the boys."

"Hmp! What they doin' here?"

Hans shrugged his shoulders and lifted the palms of his hands. He had told all he knew.

"Got out, eh? Musta known we were headin' this way," Jasper boasted.

Stone laughed, softly, ironically. "Where do you get that line of talk, Jas? Ever hear of old Pete McCann givin' the middle of the road to anybody? He's there both ways from the ace, if you ask me."

"We'll show him how much he's there before we're through."

"Yes?" drawled the Texan, lazily and insolently.

"I'll tell him so, right off the reel, him or any of his outfit soon as I meet up with 'em," the young man bragged.

He was irritated at Stone. Was the gunman on the Stark side of the feud? He was taking old Matt's money. Well then, why did he talk like that?

"Better tell 'em kinda low, so's they don't hear, Jas. A few of 'em are curly wolves. Leastways they've got that rep."

"You scared of 'em, Dave?"

Jasper was alarmed at his own question. His eyes fell before the chill steady regard of the little man.

After a moment the Texan spoke. His words lessened the tension. "I reckon my six-gun will have to talk for me when the times comes, Jas."

After some time of rapid refreshment at the bar the Circle Cross riders moved out again to the main street of the little town. Stone had already departed temporarily to buy a shirt. Gitner and Phil Stark had business at the blacksmith shop. Jasper strolled across to Basford's for the mail. Inside, he caught a glimpse of the little Texan at the dry goods counter.

Public opinion, represented by Quinn, Shell, and others, still sat on the porch and awaited developments. It watched Jasper Stark now to see what he would do about the placard on the wall. It had watched Stone, too. The Texan had read it with an expressionless face and offered no comment.

Jasper swelled, evidently steaming up to blow off. He could not resist taking the center of the stage. In the safe middle states he might have been a ward boss. Unfortunately for him leadership in the Southwest demanded, first of all, gameness. He was always trying to fill a place he had not the stark courage to hold.

"Hmp! Wants information, does he? An' he'll pay a thousand dollars. What's he aim to do with his information when he gets it?"

Jasper's voice was heavy, his manner abusive as he turned to Quinn. The cattleman did not look at him.

DRY GOODS HARDWARE
BAS

The Tortured Man Howled in Agony and Begged Shamelessly for Mercy.

His expressionless eyes were on a cloud of dust far down the road ribbon. A rider was cantering toward Mesa.

"Why, he didn't tell me, Jas. Yore guess is as good as mine," Quinn answered evenly.

Jasper was "wilding up," as Simp Shell expressed it later. He was full of bad whisky and a sense of his own importance. He strutted, moving up and down the porch as he boasted.

"Don't amount to a hill of beans, this don't." The drink-excited man snapped his fingers contemptuously at the poster. "Say he knew. What then? What then?"

His back was toward the man coming down the road. If he had been observant he might have seen an odd change in the gray eyes of Quinn, a flicker of subdued and wary excitement.

"I'll show Peter McCann where he gets off," Stark went on, vanity overriding caution. "I'll sure learn that hombre not to run on the rope." He took two swift strides forward and with one sweeping gesture ripped the reward placard from the wall. Tearing the paper into fragments, he flung them down and ground them under his heel.

At the same instant a rider pulled up in front of the store and swung from the saddle. Stark turned, the anger he had worked up burning in him.

On the lower step a man was standing, his quirt dangling by the loop from his wrist.

Under his ribs the heart of Jasper Stark died within him. For the man looking at him was Wilson McCann. He had a feeling as though the ground were falling from his feet, a shocked certainty that he had been delivered into the hand of his enemy. His arm made a motion toward the revolver at his side, a hesitant and indefinite gesture.

"Don't you!" warned McCann.

Stark dropped his hand. In his eyes was the look of the trapped rat. His brother and Gitner were nearly half a mile away, but Stone was here, not twenty yards from him. The Texan would pump lead into McCann if he got gay. With the thought came a resurgence of courage. He had nothing to fear.

His voice was loud, to attract the attention of his companion. "You'll pull yore freight, Wils McCann, if you know what's good for you. Get me. Poco tiempo."

McCann came up the steps toward him, evenly and without haste. There was that in his face at which Jasper took alarm.

"Keep back. Hear me? Keep back, or I'll—" Jasper retreated to the door, his voice rising to a shriek. "Don't you dass lay a hand on me."

His enemy plucked him from the shelter of the store as though he had been a child. The quirt in the hand of McCann rose and fell, rose and fell again. Jasper cursed, threatened, wept. He called to Stone for help, tried to break away from that iron grip and escape, did all he could to save himself except stand up and fight. The swinging lash burned like a rope of fire. The tortured man howled in agony and begged shamelessly for mercy.

He flung himself to the floor and McCann released him. The man with the quirt was panting from his exertions. He looked down scornfully at the quivering mass of wheals at his feet.

"You'll learn to—let my father's placards alone. Understand? An' not to shoot at me from the brush, you d—d jayhawker."

McCann looked up. From the windows, from the door, from both sides of him the eyes of silent men were focussed upon him and Stark. Against the jamb of the door Stone was leaning, muscles at indolent ease, only his cold eyes warily intent. At the first glance McCann knew that the Texan had elected not to take up Jasper's quarrel.

To Medford, the store clerk, Wilson spoke. "Father forgot the mail. Left it in the store. Get it for me."

Presently the clerk appeared with a package of letters and newspapers.

"Much obliged."

The Flying VY man turned. Jim-Dandy was standing near the porch, parallel to it. With one quick leap McCann was in the saddle. His feet found the stirrups and the pony went pounding down the road at a gallop.

Presently Simp eased himself out of his chair and waddled across to the braggart huddled on the floor.

"Better get up, Jas. He's gone," Simp said.

He lent a hand to get the other to his feet. Jasper looked round, furtive-eyed, and knew he had been weighed and found wanting.

"If I hadn't slipped—," he began, and stopped. His breath was still ragged with dry sobs. "He took advantage—with his quirt."

"Yes. You only had a gun," Stone answered contemptuously. "A gun an' yore fists."

"Tell you he took advantage. I slipped," whined Jasper.

"You sure done so when you picked on this Wils McCann to raise a rookus with," Stone agreed.

Jasper limped painfully into the store and sank down into a chair. "I'm sick," he whimpered.

Medford brought him water. After a time he was helped to the hotel. He was not able to ride home and in any event he had not the nerve to face Matt Stark with even a doctored story of his humiliation.

The old man would be in a blaze of fury at him.

Matthew Stark was game to the marrow and inordinately proud. That a Stark should show the white feather to a McCann, that he should be whipped like a peon without offering fight, filled him with a bitter despair he could not endure. If Jasper had gone to his death with guns blazing he would have sorrowed for him and been proud of him. But this degradation was unspeakably horrible to him.

He ordered Phil to saddle his horse and rode to town alone. He craved action drastic and swift. First, a settlement with the weakling who had dishonored him, then battle with his enemies to revenge himself upon them. He would have Wilson McCann's blood. Nothing less would satisfy him.

The old man strode through the hall of the Mesa house and into the room that served as an office.

"What room is Jas in?" he demanded of the proprietor.

"Why, he's in the front room upstairs, Mr. Stark. Doc Sanders has been lookin' after him."

Stark was already taking the stairs. The man lying on the bed heard a heavy tread. The door burst open and his father stood before him, the fires of eruptive wrath blazing in his eyes. Jasper knew his day of judgment had come.

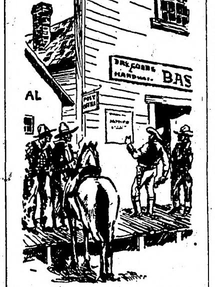
Matt Stark stood, feet well apart, leathery jaw clamped tight, and looked at his unworthy son. "Well?" he asked harshly at last.

"I slipped. He got me down," Jasper whined.

"Don't lie to me. I've seen Stone."

"I was kinda dazed. He hit me first off with the loaded end of his quirt an' I didn't know what I was doing. He 'most killed me."

"I wish he had," the father retorted bitterly. "If anyone had told me I'd raise a coward for a son—" He broke off, to deny his own claim. "But I knew it. I've known it for years, only I wouldn't let myself believe it. You were always a puling quitter. No sand in yore craw. Never was. The first Stark I ever knew without guts. I'd rather you'd died—a hundred times rather. But I'm through with you. No son of mine can stand up an' take a thrashin' without fightin' like a wildcat."



Within the Hour Printed Posters Had Been Tacked Up in Each of the Saloons, on the Wall of the Post Office.

"I was sick anyhow, an' I wasn't noticin' when he knocked me kinda senseless," Jasper whimpered.

"You're lying. An' what if he did? Pack a gun, don't you? After he'd taken the hide off, you still had yore forty-five, didn't you? Think Phil would have let him get away with it an' not pumped lead? Not for a minute. But you—you're gunshy. All you can do is drink an' brag. Why, you flabby weakling, they'll laugh at me all over the county. The McCanns 'll never quite grinnin' about it. By G—d, I couldn't a-believed it—even about you.

"I'm through with you—absolutely. Right now I'm going over to Fletcher's office to change my will. You don't get a cent—not a cent. An' you get out of Arizona. I'll give you a week to settle yore affairs. You'll pull yore freight an' change yore name. From now on you're no Stark. Understand?"

"I've got to sell my stock," Jasper said sulkily. Already he was sketching a campaign to mitigate the old man's wrath. Julia was his favorite. She could do anything with him. He would have her talk to her father and get him to be reasonable.

"I'll buy it. Name yore price. See Fletcher about it. I don't want any dealings with you myself. Don't you ever cross my track or I'll make you think this Wils McCann was only playin' at quirting you."

Matthew Stark left the room and the hotel. He walked down the street to Fletcher's office and found the lawyer was at Phoenix and would not be back for several days. The owner of the Circle Cross hesitated. He was half of a mind to go to Tucson and have a new will made at once. Any kind of delay annoyed him. But he had reasons for not wanting to leave the valley just now. The new will would have to wait till Fletcher returned.

Across the street he could see the editor of the Mesa Round-Up sitting at his desk. Stark strode across through the dust and entered the little frame building. He brushed aside the greetings of the newspaper man and ordered brusquely what he wanted.

Within the hour printed posters had been tacked up in each of the saloons, on the wall of the post office inside and out, on the door of the false-front town hall and at a dozen other conspicuous place. They bore this simple legend in blackface type.

This Is To Serve
NOTICE
That I will kill Wilson McCann on sight.
MATTHEW STARK

This attended to, Stark mounted and rode out of town. From his favorite chair on the porch of Basford's store Simp Shell watched him go, a grim and menacing figure of wrath. To Basford and another crony Simp offered the opinion that hell was liable to pop mighty soon. It was agreed that Matthew Stark and either Wilson or Peter McCann would clash at their first meeting and that from it one or both would be carried away dead or mortally wounded.

Monkeys are being taught in parts of the East Indies to gather coconuts. Proprietors of coconut plantations say that the four-legged helpers are more industrious than native workers and gather nearly twice as many as a professional gatherer.

Cost Her $4.25 To Reduce 65 Pounds
"Worth It," Miss Bates Says
If you're young and fat read what Miss Bates of Beech, Iowa, has to say about Kruschen Salts—if you are middle age or old Kruschen shows you the way to lose fat the SAFE way.
"I took one bottle of Kruschen Salts a month for five months. It amounted to $4.25 and I reduced 65 lbs. but it was worth it. Imagine just 22 years old and weighing what I did. I could not enjoy myself as other girls did. I could not get the clothes I wanted. I think it is wonderful the results Kruschen Salts give."
To lose fat the safe, sane way—take one-half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water before breakfast every morning—eat less fatty meats, potatoes and sweets—a jar that costs but a small sum lasts 4 weeks. Get it at any drugstore in the world—but be sure for your health's sake to ask for and get Kruschen Salts. It's the little daily dose that does it.

President Offers New Plan for Arms Reduction—Senator Borah's Refusal to Support Hoover—Pre-Convention Doings of Democrats.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

PRESIDENT HOOVER called the correspondents to the White House Wednesday and gave out his new plan for reducing the armed forces of the world by one-third, thereby saving between ten and fifteen billion dollars during the next ten years. At the same time his proposals were being laid before the reparations conference in Geneva by Hugh Gibson.

Hugh Gibson

As a basis the President laid down these five principles:

"1. The Kellogg-Briand pact, to which we are all signatories, can only mean that the nations of the world have agreed that they will use their arms solely for defense.

"2. This reduction should be carried out not only by broad general cuts in armaments, but by increasing the comparative power of defense through decreases in the power of the attack.

"3. The armaments of the world have grown up in general mutual relation to each other. And, speaking generally, such relativity should be preserved in making reductions.

"4. The reductions must be real and positive. They must first effect economic relief.

"5. There are three problems to deal with—land forces, air forces and naval forces. They are all interconnected. No other part of the proposals which I make can be dissociated one from the other."

Upon this foundation he proposed:

Abolition of all tanks, chemical warfare and large mobile guns.

Reduction of one third in the strength of all land armies over and above "the so-called police component."

The abolition of all bombing planes and the "total prohibition of all bombardment from the air."

Reduction in the treaty number and tonnage of all battleships by one-third.

Reduction in the treaty tonnage of aircraft carriers, cruisers and destroyers by one-fourth and of submarines by one-third, with no nation having more than 35,000 tons of submersibles.

It was said authoritatively that Mr. Hoover's plan had the full approval of Secretaries Stimson, Hurley and Adams, the chief of staff of the army, the chief of naval operations and the entire American delegation in Geneva.

When Ambassador Gibson read the President's proposals to the Geneva conference the British seemed to give them cautious general approval, but the French were frankly hostile. Premier Herriot said: "This is absolutely unacceptable. France again will raise the question of security." The Germans and Italians both liked the Hoover plan.

Russia and nearly all the smaller nations represented at Geneva let Mr. Gibson know at once that the proposal pleased them.

It was emphatically denied in Washington that the United States has made any suggestions of war debt reduction or cancellation in return for reduction in armaments.

SENATOR WILLIAM E. BORAH of Idaho can safely be counted upon to enliven the news at frequent intervals. He again furnished a major topic of conversation when, during a denunciatory speech on the Republican platform, he flatly informed his fellow senators and world that he would not support President Hoover for re-election. The gentleman from Idaho is extremely dry and he cannot stomach even the moderately moist plank which the Republican convention adopted. His conscience, rather than the party leaders, ever has been Borah's guide, and his action in this instance cannot be called inconsistent. The proposed revision of the Eighteenth amendment, he declared, is equivalent to repeal. He denounced all straddling and compromise, laying down the issue as one demanding a clear cut choice between the status quo and outright repeal. He asserted that a great majority in the Republican convention were in favor of repeal but were steamrollered by the administration forces.

Senator Borah

Senator George Norris of Nebraska, a dry Republican who often leaves his party lines, was pleased with Borah's statement, saying that now he, Norris, would not be the only renegade this fall. Later he made the surprising statement that he believed the United States must try some modified plan of dealing with the liquor question.

To the press Senator Borah said that if he had written the Republican prohibition plank it would have contained no resubmission proposal for either revision or repeal. It would, instead, have informed the country that the only constitutional method of change was through the election of members of congress pledged to submit a repeal amendment to the states.

AS THE Democrats gathered in Chicago for their national convention it become apparent that a great number of them, probably a majority, were in favor of a prohibition plank simpler and more explicit than that in the Republican platform. Most of those who had anything to say on the question wanted a resolution proposing that congress submit an amendment repealing the Eighteenth amendment, but not declaring that the party is in favor of repeal. This, it was felt, would be a safe course, and it was the opinion of Jouett Shouse and others that such a plank would be adopted. In Washington it received the indorsement of Senators Carter Glass of Virginia and Joseph T. Robinson of Arkansas.

Speaker John Garner of Texas, one of the candidates for the Presidential nomination, issued a prepared statement making an unequivocal demand for repeal of the Eighteenth amendment, which he said he never had believed sound or workable; and this was declared by other Democratic leaders to clinch the repeal plank. Garner's statement also was taken as a bid for the support of Al Smith and the others who were determined to prevent the nomination of Governor Roosevelt. In any event, it was believed, it hurt the chances of Roosevelt's being nominated in the early ballots.

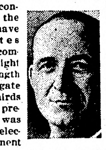
Al Smith, on his arrival in Chicago, announced that he was for a repeal plank, and for himself as the nominee, first, last and all the time.

INDIANA Democrats in state convention unanimously adopted a plank calling on congress to submit to the states an amendment to the constitution repealing the Eighteenth amendment, and calling for immediate repeal of the Wright "bone dry" state law. It declared for state laws to prevent return of the saloon and for state control of the liquor traffic.

Paul V. McNutt was nominated for governor and Frederick Van Nuys of Indianapolis for United States senator. Van Nuys was introduced as "the man who can beat Jim Watson."

Primaries of the Republican, Democratic and Farmer-Labor parties were held in Minnesota. For the nine seats in congress most of the leaders in the race were classed as wets. In Maine the Democrats nominated Louis J. Brann, wet, for governor, and the Republicans picked Burleigh Martin who is supposed to be a dry.

ROOSEVELT'S managers were seemingly undismayed by any late developments and continued to predict victory on the first ballot or soon after. It was conceded by all that the governor would have enough delegates to organize the committees, and might even go to the length of trying to abrogate the old two-thirds rule. The chief preliminary battle was to be over the selection of a permanent chairman, the Roosevelt forces insisting that Senator Thomas J. Walsh of Montana should be substituted for Jouett Shouse, who had been recommended for the position by the arrangements committee and who was one of the Smith-Raskob group.



John E. Mack

To present his name to the convention Governor Roosevelt selected John E. Mack, New York attorney and gentleman farmer, who was Roosevelt's political godfather when he first stood for public office 22 years ago. Mr. Mack is famous at home for oratory that appeals to the "common people." He is not a member of Tammany, and as he was not one of the New York delegates, room had to be made for him in the delegation.

RIGHT in the middle of all the excitement over politics came the prize fight between Max Schmeling of Germany, world's heavyweight champion, and Jack Sharkey of Boston, challenger for the title. The combat took place in a new "bowl" on Long Island and attracted about 70,000 spectators. Many millions heard it described by radio. For 15 rounds the warriors fought warily, with never a knockdown, and then to the surprise of nearly everyone, including Sharkey himself, the Bostonian was declared the winner. Gene Tunney, former champion; Mayor Jimmy Walker of New York, and a majority of the sporting writers present agreed that it was an unfair decision. The general opinion was that Schmeling had won eight rounds, Sharkey four, and one was even. Judge George Kelly and Referee Gunboat Smith voted for Sharkey. Charles Mathison, the other judge, voted for Max. Jack himself thought he had lost and started for the German's corner to congratulate him.

JUST one month from the time she started on her solo flight to Ireland, Mrs. Amelia Earhart Putnam returned to New York and was given one of the characteristic receptions of the metropolis. All the big guns of the city were out to meet her, vast crowds swarmed along the route of the procession and the air was filled with ticker tape. At city hall plaza the formal ceremonies took place, Mayor Walker presenting to the intrepid young woman the gold medal of the city, while others loaded her down with roses. In Bryant park she received the cross of honor of the United States Flag association. Next day Mrs. Putnam flew to Washington, where President Hoover received her and presented to her the medal of the National Geographic society. Toward the close of the week she was in Chicago as a guest at the Washington bicentennial military tournament.

Mrs. Putnam

Through it all Mrs. Putnam won increased admiration by her modesty and her futile efforts to belittle her achievement. She blushed deeply when Mr. Hoover said that she deserved to be placed in spirit "with the great pioneering women to whom every generation of Americans has looked up to with admiration."

CONGRESS made some progress with its work, but it was believed it would not be able to adjourn before July 2. The house passed the economy bill after adopting the administration plan for payless furloughs for federal employees and combining with it a cut in salaries of 10 per cent for members of congress and 15 per cen for the Vice President and the speaker of the house. The President and members of the Supreme court are invited to return part of their salaries to the treasury.

Although initiated to raise enough money to balance the budget, the measure still fell between $100,000,000 and $200,000,000 short of the savings needed for the balancing of next year's budget. The size of the gap depended mainly on reductions to be made in the department supply bills that were still before congress.

The senate passed the Wagner federal loan and construction relief bill after adding to the measure the Wagner $300,000,000 direct relief bill which it had already passed and which was pending in the house. The combined measure carries $2,300,000,000 for federal relief projects, divided as follows:

For loans to states for the direct relief of the unemployed (the first Wagner bill), $300,000,000; for federal construction projects, $500,000,000; for loans to states and their political subdivisions and to private corporations for public, self-liquidating projects, as toll bridges, tunnels, water works, and canals, $1,460,000,000; for financing agricultural exports, $40,000,000.

HALF a million people from twenty-five nations gathered in Dublin for the thirty-first international Eucharistic congress, and the Irish capital enjoyed the great religious jubilation to the utmost. The procathedral could hold only 2,400, but the throngs massed outside were enabled to hear the speeches and songs through loud speakers.

The procession, forming across the street in a school made temporarily a robing room, was led by Bishop Heylen of Namur, the president of the permanent congress committee. He followed by Archbishop Byrne of Dublin, sponsor of this congress; by Cardinal Lauri, the papal legate, and then by the ten other cardinals and their suites.

Archbishop Byrne, as sponsor of the congress, was the first speaker on the opening program, followed by Bishop Heylen and the papal legate. On succeeding days there were high masses, sectional meetings and a great mass gathering in Phoenix park.

CARLOS DAVILA, restored to the headship of the junta ruling Chile, was sick abed, but his associates were taking strong measures to suppress the latest attempt of the Communists to get control of the government. There was considerable rioting in which some men were killed, and the Reds tried to rescue Col. Marmaduke Grove, the extreme radical who for a short time had displaced Davila and was then made prisoner and started on the way to exile on lonely Juan Fernandez island.

Col. Grove

The ruling Socialist junta outlawed Communistic agitation by decree, with exile, imprisonment or fines as the punishment for attempts to foment trouble. The garrison commander in Santiago issued a drastic set of martial law regulations to end the violence and unrest, and ordered that agitators guilty of rebellion, plundering or resisting authorities should be shot.

GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT transmitted to Mayor Jimmy Walker of New York city a copy of the charges made against the latter by Samuel Seabury and two citizens' organizations, and called on him to reply to them. The mayor answered that he was going to the national convention in Chicago and would take up the matter after his return.

Who Said VALUES?
You can't beat these!
RIGHT now, Goodyear is building the best tires that ever came from the world's largest rubber factory.
Right now, you can get the lowest tire prices ever featured before a July 4th holiday.
This statement is true, even though the prices shown here include the new U. S. tax.
Read them and be convinced. These prices buy Goodyear Speedways—the tires that have been making such a sensation in this low-price year.
They're real Supertwist Balloons—built to Goodyear standards—marked with the Goodyear name and house flag—with the extra mileage of Goodyear balanced construction.
When you look at these big, husky, stout and sturdy Goodyears you'll certainly say to yourself:
"Why buy any second-choice tire when FIRST-CHOICE costs no more?"

Recalls First Use of Oxygen in Saving Life

A Pennsylvania country doctor told the America Therapeutic society in convention at Baltimore how a dying patient's plea: "Give me breath! Give me breath!" led to the physician's discovery forty-seven years ago of oxygen's life-saving property in the treatment of pneumonia.

Dr. G. E. Holtzapple, of York, Pa., described how from 10 a. m. until late at night March 6, 1885, he sat on a bedroom floor in Loganville, Pa., and with a test tube, a flame, some black manganese of iron, some potash, a cork and some tubing generated oxygen which, bubbling up from a bucket of water held under the patient's nose and mouth, turned his face from blue to pink and set him on the road to recovery.

A short time before he made his discovery Doctor Holtzapple had been graduated from Bellevue hospital medical college. The patient recovered and now lives only a few doors from the physician.

To Handle Barnsdall Line

Hjalmar Peterson, who for many years was manager of the Standard Oil Company here but quit them some time ago, will go into oil business again.

He will now be connected with the Engen Garage and will take charge of the Barnsdall line of products.

O. H. Nohre and family, T. E. Ellestad and family, Miss Clara Ellestad, Ernie Gilbertson and Mrs. A. Visness were entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. S. H. Nohre on Monday.

Bank in Good Condition

We are this week publishing the bank call for the Marshall County State bank showing the financial condition of the bank as set forth on the 30th day of June. The bank here is doing a thriving business and is in a very comfortable financial condition as the figures in the call report shows.

First Wheat of Season Sold

The first car of 1932 wheat to arrive on the Minneapolis market come there on Monday from Meckling, So. Dak. It graded No. 3 hard winter, tested 57.5 pounds per bushel, showed 14.5 moisture and 11.80 percent protein. The car sold at 49c a bushel to a milling company.

As far as we know John Hoffman is the first farmer to cut a grain crop here this year. He started on Tuesday to harvest a nice crop of rye.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Visness and two children of Sannish, N. Dak., spent the week end here visiting at the Oliver and Sivert Nohre homes.

BLANKET YOUR CREAM----
A Wet One in Summer and a Dry One in Winter

A sudden change of temperature, too far up or too far down, is a poor thing for cream.

When delivering cream in the summer, it is good business to wet a blanket and cover up the cans. This will enable you to deliver your cream cool and sweet. Likewise, in freezing weather, wrap the cans in a dry blanket to keep the cream from freezing, as freezing impairs the quality of your cream.

W. C. T. U. Held Annual Meeting

The annual meeting of the W.C.T.U. was held at the home of Mrs. O. J. Backlund Tuesday afternoon. There were seven members and seven visitors present.

Mesdames Styrlund, Pierce, Brown and Lundgren from the Warren W. C. T.U. were among the visitors. Mrs. Styrlund, district president, conducted the meeting and gave an interesting report of the District Convention held at Detroit Lakes.

Mrs. Alfred Anderson and Mrs. Pierce led in Devotionals.

Eunice Johnson and Cleo Peterson, winners of the Silver Medal in the declamatory contests, are planning to take part in a Gold Medal contest in Thief River Falls some time in the near future.

New officers elected for the coming year are

President, Leona L. Davis
Vice-President, Mrs. S. Lorentson
Secretary, Mrs. G. Sanoden
Treasurer, Mrs. C. A. Davis

Plans are under way for an outdoor meeting to be held in August. Visitors always welcome.

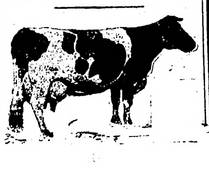
Let us remember that Abraham Lincoln said, "Let every one remember that he who violates the laws of the land tramples on the blood of the fathers and tears asunder the charter of his own and his children's liberty." —Leona L. Davis

World War Ghost Army

The ghosts of those who died in the World war, if they marched 10 abreast in regular formation from dawn to dusk, would require 162 days to pass the reviewing stand of Mars or anyone else who would care to see the shadowy forms of those who paid the supreme sacrifice march past. An even more impressive scene might be in setting end to end the coffins of the 13,000,000 dead soldiers and the 24,000,000 others who died of disease and other causes in the "war to end war." It would create a mourning band for the world nearly twice its equatorial circumference.

In actual dollars, it cost $18,000 to kill each soldier. This is equivalent to an expenditure of $20,000 for every hour since Christ died to redeem mankind. Such are the startling figures pondered by the Geneva Disarmament Conference and the basis of the world-wide desire to outlaw legalized murder in the name of battle, an ancient method of settling international grievances.

A German mathematician estimates that the World war resulted in casualties of 11,000,000 killed and 19,000,000 maimed, with an expenditure of more than $500,000,000,000, a sufficient amount of money to buy a $2,500 home in a five acre plot, with $1,250 worth of furniture, for each and every family in the United States, Canada, Australia, England, Belgium, France, Russia, and Germany, and in addition a hospital, university, and schools, including the salaries of teachers, nurses, doctors, and professors, for every group of 20,000 inhabitants.—Pathfinder.



Becomes Insane

H. B. Young, local postmaster, who has been on the sick list for some time and, has spent most of the past month in a hospital at Thief River Falls, lost his mind last week.

He was taken out from the hospital on Saturday and was taken to Warren where he was examined at a hearing by the probate court and was there declared insane and ordered to the State Hospital at Fergus Falls.

H. O. Hanson and Hjalmar Peterson took him from Thief River Falls to Warren and also accompanied the sheriff as body guards to Fergus Falls the same evening, returning here Sunday.

Worry and sickness seemed to be what had hit Mr. Young who is 60 years old. The sympathy of the entire community goes out to the old gentleman and we are holding out hope that after he has rested up and received special medical care, we may see him well and back here in little town where he made his home for eighteen years.

Burn Poison Bran Sacks

A. G. Ruggles and T. Aamodt, University farm, state leaders in the grasshopper control campagn, are especially urging all farmers and others having anything to do with poison bait be very careful to avoid danger to human life or livestock by leaving any of the poison bran exposed.

Bait should be kept sacked except when used, and the empty sacks should be burned and the ashes buried. Under no circumstances should the sacks be used for any other purpose after having contained poison bait.

Likewise, any container used to hold arsenic, including arsenic barrels, should be burned and the ashes buried. Trying to save any such equipment means taking chances of killing livestock or endangering human life. Livestock may lick up ashes of such arsenic containers unless buried to a safe depth.

8000 People Attend Picnic

According to a report received here, there was about 8000 people that attended the 5th annual picnic of the Marshall County Land O' Lakes Cooperative Creameries held at the Old Mill in Foldahl township on Sunday.

Many people from here took in the doings and had a good time.

Redals Leave on Vacation

Rev. and Mrs. L. M. Redal and family left on Tuesday to spend a month at the lake.

Their address is Lovinia, Minn. Cottage 3, and its located on the southeast shore of Lake Bemidji.

Joe Nelson returned home on Tuesday from Minneapolis where he spent about ten days on a pleasure trip.

REPAIRS

Look over your mowers now and see what you need in the line of repairs.

I am carrying a more complete line of repairs this year than ever before, and PRICES ARE LOWER.

See me before you buy repairs for farm machinery. I can save you money.

FAITH

Nothing is impossible to the man who has faith. Faith moves mountains.

Every dark cloud has a silver lining. It is well to observe the darkness but let us not overlook the light—the bright spots. Worry sinks us deeper into our misfortunes. What is needed most is sober thought and judgment and a happy outlook upon life. Why buy misery?

Every depression is followed by a period of prosperity. Hogs, butterfat, eggs and grains have been almost valueless before. Remember, it is impossible to have profits without some losses occasionally. Happiness is all the more sweet because of some sorrow.

Let's forget our troubles with a little faith in the future and with a clear mind divorced of fear and worry we will win and be happy.

SYNOPSIS

Wilson McCann, young Arizona ranchman, finds an old friend, Jim Yerby, with a broken leg. Julia Stark, daughter of Matthew Stark, inveterate enemy of the McCanns, is rendering first aid. Taking a note from Julia to her father, Wilson is fired on by Jasper, Julia's brother. On the way from Yerby's place to her home, Julia learns her companion's identity and dismisses him in anger, the old feud rankling. Ann Gifford, with her young sister, Ethel, are sheep raisers, and on that account unpopular with the cattlemen. "Night riders" burn a cabin and shoot a McCann ranch hand. Peter McCann, Wilson's father, offers a reward for the disclosure of their identity. Wilson McCann horsewhips Jasper, he making practically no resistance. Matthew disowns his son for his cowardice, and posts notice he will kill Wilson McCann on sight.

CHAPTER IV

Red Tragedy

Wilson drew up among the scrub pines on the side of the hogback across from Yerby's cabin. These days he followed roundabout trails and moved with extreme caution. For his life had been posted by a man who never made vain threats. It was the sight of a white-faced bay standing in front of the house that brought him up short now.

With the trained eye of a cowpuncher he recognized the horse instantly. He had last seen it on a certain moonlit night and Julia Stark had been in the saddle. But he had no certainty that she was using it today. Some one else might be waiting for him in Jim's cabin—say Jasper Stark or his father or that Texas killer, Gitner. He decided to play safe.

From its place beside the saddle he drew a rifle and tested its mechanism. This done, he crept on all fours through the greasewood and the yucca till he had put a long hundred yards between him and Jim-Dandy. Behind a clump of cholla he squatted and watched the house patiently. For nearly half an hour he did not stir. Except his eyes he was motionless as a statue.

Julia Stark might not be alone with Yerby, though the fact that he could see only one saddled horse pointed to that conclusion. With the greatest care, he worked toward the house from the rear.

When at last he reached the window Wilson raised his head slowly and looked inside. Julia had seated herself and was evidently just about to read aloud from a book. Jim was sitting in a chair with his leg propped up in another chair in front of him.

Wilson went back to his horse, rode across the arroyo, and shouted, "Hello the house!"

Miss Stark came to the door. She stood, erect and uncompromisingly hostile, watching him as he dismounted. Her dark look was like a flashing sword.

He nodded good morning without response.

"How's Jim?" he asked.

She stood aside to let him pass into the house, gathering her skirts close so that he would not brush against her as he went by. Nothing could have expressed more positively her detestation of him than that disdainful gesture.

With jingling spur he moved across the room. "How are you, Dad?"

"Fat like a match. Whad you know that's new?"

"Not much. Gather of beeves on Poison creek next month. Some more rustling up in the hills, they say."

McCann chatted easily, casually, with the nester, ignoring the burning resentment that held the girl passionately silent. His manner was coolly indifferent, but not for a moment was he off guard.

Watching him covertly, Julia saw a sudden change in the lounging figure. The back straightened and the muscles grew taut. Every sense had quickened to life. For some one was coming up the path toward the house.

Julia moved quickly to the door, then drew a breath of relief. She had dreaded and half expected to see her father. But the approaching figure was that of a young woman.

The new arrival was Ann Gifford. She had brought with her a cake. Since Yerby's accident she had been in the habit of coming every day to supply the simple needs. Even her fierce aloofness had not been proof against the little man's good will. Nobody who knew him could continue to dislike Jim Yerby.

"Meet Miss Julia Stark, Miss Gifford," their host said, and after pronouncing the formula added: "Miss Julia she's jest back from Los Angeles, where she's learned 'most everything they is to know outa them schoolbooks, I reckon."

Julia laughed at this testimonial as she stepped forward to shake hands. She had wanted to meet the Gifford girls ever since her return. Ann was still holding the cake and she did not put it down. Coldly she bowed.

"I called the other day, Miss Gifford, but you weren't at home," Julia said. "May I come again—some day soon?"

"We're often out with the sheep," Ann replied.

It was a rebuff, but Julia refused to accept it. "You can't be out all the time. I'll try my luck again," she said.

Yerby tried to cover Ann's discourtesy by a flux of words. "Miss Julia she was jest startin' to read to me from this here David Dickens book."

"David Copperfield," Julia corrected.

"Sure enough. Dickens he's the fellow that owns the brand. Well, I was sayin' that this Steerforth duck, the one that done li'l Emily dirt, why some one had orta hung his hide out to dry, seems like. I don't hold with dry-gulching, you understand, but there's times—"

The nester stopped abruptly, the springs of his garrulity dried up. A glance at Ann Gifford's frozen face had done it. He recalled the rumors that had come to him as to the reason why Nora had gone to Los Angeles and embarrassment flamed in his countenance.

McCann rescued him by commenting on the number of characters in the book. "I never did see so many footloose folks trailin' around. There's David an' Peggoty an' Miss Betsy an' the Murdstones an' Barkis—"

"Looks like he'd have trouble with all them folks millin' around in his haid whilst he was writin'," the old-timer mused aloud. "But this Dickens guy sure knows how to throw a rope so as to cut out any of 'em from the herd when he's good an' ready."

Ann Gifford did not stay. Her manner implied that she wanted to have nothing to do with any of them except Yerby.

The nester spoke first. "I'd like right well to do something for her an' her li'l sister if I knew what," he said, wrinkling his forehead in thought. "O' course sheep are pests. I ain't denyin' that none. But seems like these girls ain't hardly to blame because old Andy Gifford was so mean and obstinate he plumb wasn't contented till he'd started trouble."

"Exactly how I feel," McCann agreed.

Julia had opened her lips to say substantially the same thing, but she closed them again without speaking. She did not intend to be of the same opinion as Wilson McCann on any subject.

Nevertheless she had a word to say to him, and before she left she said it. He had stepped out to bring a bucket of water from the spring. She met him under a live oak a few yards from the house.

"You know my father is looking for you?" she said abruptly.

"Some one did mention that to me," he said.

"Why don't you go away? Why don't you leave the country?" she demanded.

"Because Matt Stark has served notice on me of his intentions?" he asked grimly. "What kind of a man would I be if I ran away after that? Am I the one lookin' for trouble? Did I print bills sayin' I'd kill him on sight?" His face was hard as hammered iron.

"You know why he did that—because you jumped on Jasper when he wasn't looking and beat him when he couldn't defend himself."

He laughed, scornfully. "That's the story he's telling, is it?"

"And now Father's crazy mad. If you don't go away—"

"I'm not going," he cut in harshly.

"Then some one will be killed," she cried despairingly.

"Yes."

His brown competent fingers were on the barrel of the rifle he had been carrying in one hand. There flowed through her a sense of his virile power. This man was dangerous. His force expressed itself in the cool quiet eyes, in the clean lines of the face and figure, in a certain wary stillness that meant reserve strength.

"If you'd only go—while there's still time—"

Her distress touched his not very accessible heart, the more because he knew her capable of fierce and primitive passion. Independence and courage were of the essence of her. But her pride could not stand out against the shadow of tragedy hovering in the background.

"I can't go. What would folks say?"

"Does it matter what they'd say if you were doing right?" she asked.

"It would matter to me. Besides, I'd not be doing right to go. This is where I live—the only country I know. I can't let anyone run me out. I've got to go through."

"Why have you?" she pleaded. "It's all wrong, this feud. If you'd just go away, for a while, maybe things would quiet down. Then you could come back."

He shook his head. "No, I can't go. I don't want to have any trouble with yore father, but if he's bent on it, why it'll have to come."

With a little gesture of hopelessness she gave up. It was of no use. Before making the attempt to move him she had known it would be. For according to the frontier code he was right. None but a weakling could run away after an enemy had served notice that he was looking for him.

As she turned away his voice stopped her.

"I'll promise one thing. It'll be a fair fight far as I'm concerned—no layin' in the bushes an' waitin' for him."

Her dark troubled eyes rested in his. Their appealing beauty disturbed him. He would have liked to give peace to her worried soul. But he could offer no assurance. When the hour came, if it lay within his power, he must strike her to the heart.

Much stirred, he watched her lissom young body as it moved with light rhythm toward the house. She belonged to the enemy clan, but he could not hold her in cold disapproval. An enemy, yes! But already he knew her a very dear one whose presence filled the secret places of his being.

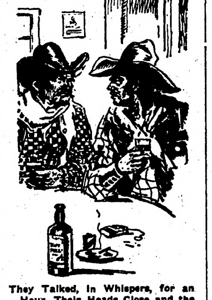
As Jasper Stark moved about the streets of Mesa with his slouching gait his eyes furtively questioned public opinion to discover what it thought of him. His manner of braggadocio still sat on him, but it was a hollow mockery. He was full of shame, resentment, and self-pity. Hatred surged in him.

He sent for Gitner. That hardy ruffian straddled into an upstairs room of the Gilt Edge and looked at young Stark with a scarcely veiled sneer.



They Talked, in Whispers, for an Hour, Their Heads Close and the Door Locked.

"Want to see me?" he asked.

"Yep. Heard the old man say anything about me, Carl?"

"The old man don't mention yore name. It's understood at the Circle Cross that Matt's through with you. Why?"

"Sit down," Jasper growled, with annoyed impatience. "I wantta talk." He pushed the bottle on the table toward the other man.

Gitner took a chair and a drink. He offered no comment. There was a tactical advantage in forcing the other to lead and he availed himself of it.

"Shove that bottle north by west," Stark said surlily, and then poured himself a large drink. He tossed it down at a gulp and almost at once replenished the tumbler. Morosely he eyed the liquor. "The old man been to town this week?"

"No. Last time he was in was the day he read the riot act to you," Gitner grinned maliciously. "But he's had Fletcher out to the ranch an' they spent 'most a whole mornin' together."

Jasper gloomed at his drink and poured it down his throat without visible pleasure.

"He was making a will, don't you reckon?" he said at last.

"I reckon."

"Question is, has he signed it yet?"

"If you want to know, who don't you go ask him?" suggested the Texan with sarcasm.

"I don't need to ask him. He hasn't. Fletcher would draw it up when he come back to town. That would be the way they fixed it. But Fletcher had to leave Thursday night again for Phoenix to argue a case before the Supreme court. He got back this afternoon, not more 'an an hour ago. He'll finish writing up the will tomorrow."

"Looks like," agreed the man from the Lone Star state.

"An' he'll take it out either in the afternoon or next day."

"Sounds reasonable. Better kiss the ranch good-by, Jas."

The eyes of the two met and held fast. There was something of crouched significance in Jasper's narrowed gaze. It brought the other man to a wary and alert attention. He knew that he was going to find out now why he had been asked to come here.

They talked, in whispers, for an hour, their heads close and the door locked. Not once, though they drank much, did their voices lift. It might have been noticed, if anyone had been observing them, that Gitner left the Gilt Edge half an hour before his companion. Nobody but Hans the bartender knew that they had been in the room together.

At the hotel waiting for him Jasper found his sister. They walked a little distance down the road to be alone.

"No use, Jas," she told him. "I've fought it out with Dad and he won't listen to a word. He's cutting you out of his will."

"That'll suit you an' Phil," he sneered. "What do you care if I do get a rotten deal?"

Her scornful eyes flashed anger at him. "That's a nice thing to say, after I quarreled with Dad about it for you. But you always were a poor loser."

"I haven't lost yet," he snarled. "If you think I'll sit down an' let him cut me outa my share of the ranch, why, you've got another guess. I'll not stand for it."

"You can't help yourself," Julia told him curtly. His boasting was an old story with her and she gave it no weight. "What's the matter with you anyhow, Jas? Why didn't you stand up and fight Wils McCann?"

"Tell you he hit me when I wasn't lookin'. Tell you I was dazed an' I fell. He jumped me when I was down. It's the honest-to-God truth."

She was convinced he was lying to save his face, but there was no use telling him so.

"When are you going?" she asked.

"Going where?"

"Away from here."

"Who said I was going?"

"Why, I thought—Dad said—"

"I don't care what he said. He's not runnin' me. When I get good an' ready maybe I'll go an' maybe I won't."

She came to a subject that never was long from her thoughts. The fact that she mentioned it at all to her brother, from whom she could expect no help, showed how much the dread of it obsessed her.

"I'm worried about Dad—awf'ly worried. Every time he rides away from the house my heart sinks. If he should meet that Wils McCann—and of course he will some time—"

"Does he ride alone?"

"Not if we can prevent it. I go with him when he'll let me—or Phil—and once or twice Dave Stone. But if Dad sees we're trying to protect him he gets wild and won't have it for a minute."

"Sure. That's the old man for you. Well, you tell him something for me, Jule. He's not the only man that's lookin' for Wils McCann."

Her startled eyes fastened to his. "What do you mean?"

"What d'you reckon I mean? I'm a Stark, no matter what the old man says—an' he's a McCann an' on top of that he's done me dirt. I'll fix him, sure as he's a foot high. But keep it under yore hat. I ain't gettin' out any bills about it. Not none."

She was torn by conflicting emotions. That Jasper had spirit enough to fight his own battle, if he really meant it and would not weaken when it came to the test, was news that warmed her blood. The danger in which her father stood might be averted if her brother met McCann first. Yet this was cold comfort. After the first flush of gladness for Jasper she knew by the chill that drenched her heart how dreadful it would be if any of her family killed Wilson McCann or were killed by him.

"Isn't there any way out, Jas—any way at all but this?" she cried, almost in a wail. "Do we have to start this—this awful feud? Surely there must be some way I could stop it if I only knew how."

Yellow lights gleamed like sinister beacons in his cold eyes. "No way. The McCanns started this an' it'll have to go through now."

Julia turned back toward the hotel with sick foreboding in her heart.

* * * * * * *

Phil was blabbing a calf when his father came out to the porch.

"Going to Mesa, son. Hook up the team for me, won't you?"

The boy, before he went to the stable, dodged for a moment into the kitchen. Julia was making pies.

"He's going to Mesa," he said quickly.

Julia at once unfastened her apron. "Keep him here till I'm dressed," she told him, and moved in her swift light way to the bedroom she used.

While Phil, with the assistance of a wrangler, was hitching to a buckboard the half-broken colts his father drove, a rider jogged up and stopped to pass word. The man worked for an outfit down the river.

"'Lo, Red!" Phil greeted him. "How they comin'?"

"No complaint, as ol' man Peters said when his third wife died. Everything fine an' dandy with you?"

Red eased his weight in the saddle to relax stiffened muscles and rolled a cigarette.

"Miz Rollins jes' got back from Los Angeles, and she happened on a piece of news out there right interestin'," he volunteered. "She was takin' care of her daughter whilst an interestin' event was occurrin'. They was a nurse there to meet the li'l stranger the stork was bringin', an' it seems she was hired awhile ago to look after Nora Gifford, one o' them sheep-ranch women. The Gifford girl she had a hard time of it an' died—her an' the baby, too. Folks have kinda figured they was something wrong when the oldest sister come back alone. There's been right consid'rable talk."

Phil flushed angrily. "Why don't folks mind their own d—d business?" he blurted out. "We're in big business when we pick on some lone girls an' make their life hell for them." The generous indignation of youth flamed in him.

"Tha's right, too," agreed Red.

"I knew Nora Gifford—some. She was a mighty sweet girl. The lobo wolf that ruined her life had ought to be hunted down an' shot in his tracks."

"Y'betcha!" agreed Red with the easy variability of the cowpuncher. "Dry-gulchin' wouldn't be none too good for him."

From his hip pocket he dragged a sack of "smoking." "I seen Wils McCann as I come up the road," he said, in a carefully casual voice. "He was fixin' the head gates of that ditch runnin' along the ridge to his father's place."

"Right now?" asked Phil instantly.

"Well, it's a good four-five miles from here. Say an hour ago."

Matthew Stark came out from the house and swung across the yard toward the stable with his strong bow-legged stride. As usual he carried a rifle. He had not covered twenty yards before Julia appeared.

"Oh Dad!" she called.

Stark stopped, waiting for her. But before she could frame her request he refused it.

"No, you can't go to town with me. I don't care how many dofunnys you got to buy. No use you pesterin' me either. You ain't going. That's settled."

"We're out of salt, Dad, and canned tomatoes, and lots of things."

"You make a list. I'll get 'em. Now, honey, don't you argue with me about it. It won't be a mite of use."

She came up close and took him by the coat lapels. She had always been the center of his dearest love. In his heart he thought her the most beautiful and wonderful creature under heaven.

"I want to go—awf'ly," she whispered, her deep dark eyes appearingly earnest.

Renaissance Period of World's Great Advance

The Renaissance (literally the "rebirth") may be defined briefly in the phrase of a great classical scholar, Sir Richard Jebb, as "the whole process of transition in Europe from the medieval to the modern order." The movement, the beginnings of which are associated with Petrarch (1304-74) and the humanists of the Fourteenth century in Italy, was stimulated by the momentous events of the Fifteenth century—particularly the fall of Constantinople, which drove Byzantine scholars with the literature of Greece into western Europe, the invention of printing, and the discovery of America. This "rebirth" or "awakening," which spread to France and northern Europe in the Sixteenth century, was especially noticeable in the development of what are called the "fine arts." In Italy it led to great advances in expressional painting and sculpture, and to a return to classical design of architecture; in France it developed especially in art and letters under Louis XII and Francis I; in Britain the movement expressed itself most notably in literature, following upon the impulse to classical learning given by Erasmus, Colet, Moore, and others; while in Germany the movement became associated with the Reformation.

Snakes in Hibernation

Snakes seek fissures among the rocks in which to hibernate during the winter months. Although during this period of inactivity they can stand considerable cold, temperatures at or below the freezing point are quite likely to kill them. They seem to have an uncanny instinct of selecting their winter shelters at points that will not fall below the danger line in temperature.

National Conventions

Although performing the function of selecting a man to rule the nation for four years, there is not one single statute relating to national conventions. Public opinion alone polices them and they are sovereign in themselves. A century ago, when national conventions had their inception, John Quincy Adams wrote in his diary. "These meetings cannot be multiplied without resulting in deeper tragedies. Their manifest tendency is to civil war." Nevertheless, the national conventions have reigned supreme and no man not chosen by one ever has been elected President.

As Old as His Creed

The story is told of a young rector who, after a sermon on the divine character of the church, was approached by an elderly lady who said wrathfully: "How dare a boy like you talk to us in that manner?"

The young man, who still wore his surplice, drew himself up and replied with crushing dignity: "Madam, when I have this on I am 1,900 years old."—Boston Transcript.

The Way of a Woman

Seattle (Wash.) police asked Mrs Bessie Ingram why she didn't investigate when she heard shots next door Her reply was, "I had a roast in the oven to think about!"

Scraps of Humor

DOUBLE REASON

She followed her husband down the stairs and seated herself opposite him at the breakfast table.

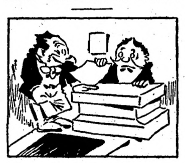
"I hope you weren't annoyed because I sharpened a pencil with your razor, darling?" she innocently asked.

"Yes, I was—twice," he replied patiently.

"Twice, darling?" she echoed.

"Yes, after I had given up trying to shave I tried to write with the pencil," he returned.

NOW THEY BOTH KNOW



"Of course you know, landlord, that living is very dear, and—

"Yes, yes, of course. In fact, I shall have to raise my rents on account of it. Here's a new contract with an additional $100 per year?"

Long Journey

A man who spends a good deal of time traveling is devoted to golf when at home. He is more celebrated for enthusiasm than for accuracy.

One day he got into a deep bunker, where he stayed for a long time.

His opponent strolled over to discover the globe-trotter had dug quite a sizable hole in his efforts to dislodge the ball.

"Well, Bill," he said, genially, "off to Australia again?"—London Tit-Bits.

Benefits of College

Overheard in a restaurant near the City Hall park:

"How's your son making out at college, Bill?"

"Fine; he's improving all the time."

"Getting good marks, eh?"

"Well, his marks aren't so hot, but his letters touching me for money are becoming more grammatical every week."—New York Sun.

Unexpected Flight

A dub golfer had lost his ball and not unnaturally was inclined to be annoyed with his caddie. "Why the deuce didn't you watch where it went?" he demanded angrily.

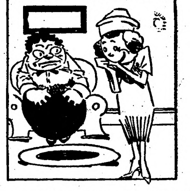
"Well, sir," said the boy, "it doesn't usually go anywhere, and so it took me unpreparedlike."—Boston Transcript.

Thermometer

Gene, in her first term at school, insisted that she was a "thermometer" and her parents were at a loss to know what she meant. Later her mother visited the school and heard the teacher call the pupils in the front seats her "front monitors."

Then Gene whispered: "That's me, mom!"

HUBBY'S TOPIC



Mrs. Oldwed—Does your husband talk much about his mother's cooking?

Mrs. Newwed—No. He talks about mine.

Seeking Adequate Protection

"How did that big boy in gangland come to get sent to the penitentiary?" asked Bill the Burg.

"Must o' been p'litical influence," replied Dick the Dip. "He got so unpopular a bulletproof vest wasn't protection enough. He needed high stonework."

Change for Her

"Flo Filmer the movie star, is very fond of working in her garden."

"I suppose she enjoys having a real plot to work in."

Experience Improves

The wedding was over at last.

"Phew, that was an experience," said the bridegroom. "Did I look like a fool at the altar rail?"

"No," replied the best man, "but anyone could see that you were yourself."

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

DEMOCRATS PUT ON ROARING SHOW AT CONVENTION

Picked Roosevelt and Garner as Standard Bearers for National Race.

By WRIGHT A. PATTERSON

Chicago.—The democracy of America met in national convention in this city, and, at the end of six days and two nights of strenuous labor, had selected Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt of New York as its candidate for President; Speaker John N. Garner of Texas as its candidate for vice president; adopted a platform, one plank of which provides for repeal of the Eighteenth amendment and the immediate modification of the Volstead act to permit the sale of beer and light wines; listened to the speech of acceptance by its candidate for President, and adjourned.

The above paragraph tells the news of the Democratic convention. It tells what was presumably done in the convention hall, but no news paragraph can give the reader a picture of a national political gathering, nor can that picture be painted with only the ingredients found in a convention hall.

Both national conventions of this year consisted of a gathering of 2,308 delegates and alternates; men and women from every state in the Union and from every outlying possession. Quite naturally they felt they were at Chicago representing the sovereign will of their party members in their respective districts, and sat in the convention, in the glare of the spotlights, for that purpose. But of that 2,308 men and women less than one-fourth actually had a voice in deciding what would be done, and the one-fourth diplomatically or sometimes brutally, told the other 1,500 what they would do. A goodly percentage of the 2,308 delegates and alternates did not know just what it was all about.

On the floor of the convention about 90 per cent of the activities was bunk and ballyhoo, noise and hysteria, a useless effort to create sentiment for or against this, that or the other policy, or this that or the other candidate. The other 10 per cent consisted of the ratification of what had been accomplished by the leaders behind closed doors in committee meetings held in hotel rooms. If it were not done in that way a convention would never end, and party government in America would be impossible.

Conventions Much Alike.

That, in brief, is a picture of any national political convention, and it was as true of the Democratic convention as of any other, with the exception that the committees were in no sense unanimous, and there were minority reports presented from practically every one of them on practically every question of policy. In the end, however, the wishes of the majority of each committee were ratified by the majority on the floor.

The ballyhoo of the convention was particularly noticeable, as it always has been, at the time of presenting the names of candidates to the convention. It began shortly before two o'clock Thursday afternoon, continued until the adjournment at six, began again at nine that night and continued without a break until four-thirty Friday morning.

For nominating speeches, of which there were nine—Roosevelt, Smith, Ritchie, Traylor, Garner, White, Byrd, Reed and Murray—20 minutes each was allowed. For seconding speeches, of which there were more than 30, five minutes each was allowed. Following each nominating speech came periods of carefully staged hilarity which was supposed to represent enthusiasm, but which in the majority of cases represented noise produced by the pipe organist with the aid of all the loud pedals on the instrument.

Gallery Always in Evidence.

The exceptions were the demonstrations for Governor Smith and Governor Ritchie. In these demonstrations the unruly gallery gods took a hand and supplemented the noise made by the pipe organ. To the gallery gods these two candidates represented beer, and beer to the galleries was the most important subject before the convention. The demonstration for Roosevelt lasted 45 minutes. Then followed that for Speaker Garner, participated in by the "Gray Mare band" of Dallas and a goodly number of Texans imported for the purpose. Then came the naming of Governor Smith, and pandemonium broke loose in the galleries, as well as with the Smith delegations. They kept it up for one hour and two minutes, the record for the convention. That ended the afternoon. Four hours gone and three of the nine names before the convention.

It began again at nine and through the long weary hours of an all-night session there was speech and ballyhoo, speech and ballyhoo, until four-thirty Friday morning when that part of the job was completed and the roll was called on the first ballot for the party's candidate for President. The result was: Roosevelt, 666¼; Smith, 201¾; Garner, 92¼; White, 52; Traylor, 42½; Byrd, 25; Reed, 24; Murray, 23; Ritchie, 21; Baker, 8½. Mr. Roosevelt lacked 103¾ of the needed two-thirds to secure a nomination. Two more ballots were taken without material change in the result, and then, at eight-thirty in the morning the weary crowd quit until eight-thirty Friday night.

Roosevelt Wins.

Trades were made during Friday. Speaker John Garner was assured of second place on the ticket if his delegates threw their votes to Roosevelt, and the nomination was made on the first ballot taken at the Friday night session, the fourth ballot of the convention, Roosevelt receiving 945 votes, Smith 190¼, with 12½ votes scattered between Ritchie, Baker, White and Cox.

The Smith delegations stood loyally by their champion to the end, and there was no motion to make the nomination of Mr. Roosevelt unanimous.

At the Saturday session Speaker John N. Garner was chosen as the party's candidate for vice president. At that session Mr. Roosevelt, who had reached Chicago by plane, was present and was received with tumultuous enthusiasm. He was officially notified of his nomination and made his speech of acceptance.

The convention opened at 12:45—forty-five minutes late—on Monday. The stars of the first performance were National Chairman Raskob, making his last appearance; Commander Evangeline Booth, of the Salvation army, and Senator Barkley, temporary chairman. In his opening address the subtle wit of the national chairman was just a bit over the heads of his audience and did not produce the rip-snorting hilarity characteristic of a Democratic convention. Senator Barkey was more to the liking of the delegates and the audience, and his slaps at the Republicans brought down the house and created the noisy demonstrations that made it look and sound like a Democratic gathering.

The crowd on the opening day was not up to expectations. Chicago did not treat their Democratic guests any better than they had treated the Republicans, and a third of the seats in the Stadium were vacant. But Chicago knew the fireworks would not start the first day.

"Scraps" Not in Evidence.

With the opening of the Tuesday session at 12:50—fifty minutes late—Chicago was all set to witness a real Democratic shindig. There was the promise of a scrap over contested delegations from Louisiana and Minnesota; another over the permanent chairmanship, Walsh vs. Shouse; and a third promised over the two-thirds rule.

But the big Chicago audience that filled every available seat was disappointed. The session did not develop—on the surface—any fights but all the evidence of a Democratic love feast, except for Senator Huey Long's castigation of the "bunch of outlaws" that were contesting the seats of the senator's group of delegates.

To be sure it had not been possible for the committees on credentials and on permanent organization to arrive at unanimous opinions and there were minority reports from both committees brought to the floor of the convention, the vote of the various members of the committees indicating very clearly just where the strength or weakness of the leading candidate lay. In the committees with one vote from each state it was very evident that Governor Roosevelt could control the majority reports of these committees.

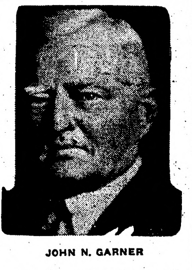
The first test came on the seating of the Long delegation from Louisiana, which was instructed for Roosevelt, the contesting delegation being uninstructed.

Long won. The minority report, the adoption of which would have unseated his delegates, was defeated by a vote of 638¾ to 514¼.

At the suggestion of Senator Barkley the oratory had been confined to the Louisiana contest and he also suggested that the convention dispose of that case before the delegates had "perpetrated" upon them the oratory in the Minnesota contest. The speech making in the Minnesota case consisted largely in the orators, and there were several, telling of the virtues of all Minnesota Democrats, only some had more virtues than others, depending upon which delegation they belonged to. The contestants were quite willing to be satisfied with half the honors, and proposed that both delegations be seated, each delegate having half a vote. In the end the contestants were defeated by a vote of 658¼ to 492¾.

Walsh Wields Gavel.

The settling of these contests was followed by what the chairman referred to as the "controversy" over the selection of the permanent chairman. The Roosevelt majority wanted Senator Walsh, the Smith, Ritchie, Reed, White, Murray, etc., etc., minority wanted Jouett Shouse, of Kansas.



JOHN N. GARNER

That "controversy" was productive of eulogistic oratory. Ralph C. O'Neill, of Kansas, eulogized Walsh while talking for Shouse, and J. F. Burns, of South Carolina, eulogized Shouse while talking for Walsh. Then came the former Democratic standard bearer, John W. Davis, who eulogized both Shouse and Walsh, though presumably talking for Shouse. On the roll call Walsh was elected by a vote of 626 to 528. To complete the love feast the elected and the defeated candidates had their pictures taken together on the speakers' platform.

The expected fight over the rules did not materialize. Governor Roosevelt had called a halt on the effort to change the century-old rule of a two-thirds vote to nominate.

Altogether it was a mild affair. No rip-snorting, roaring, Democratic demonstrations; no fistic arguments; no real entertainment for the Chicago audience that had purchased season tickets at prices up to $50; nothing to indicate that it was a Democratic National convention in session.

Wet Chicago went to the convention Wednesday night to help the wet Democratic majority put over its wet plank. It was a roaring, howling, good-natured mob that crashed the gates of the Stadium to the extent of thousands and finally forced the closing of the doors to the exclusion of large numbers who held legitimate tickets of admission.

Genuine Ovation for "Al."

The one outstanding note of Wednesday night's tumultuous session was the reception accorded Governor Smith when he took the platform to speak for the majority liquor plank. He was the hero of the convention, and, regardless of the fact that he will not get their votes, the idol of nine-tenths of the delegates. Despite every effort of the chairman to restore order that the business of the convention might be expedited, the roaring, howling, marching demonstration for "Al" lasted fifteen minutes.

The drys had a hard time. The gallery gods did not want to hear them, and made that fact evident. Despite every possible effort on the part of Senator Walsh, and all of the biting sarcasm he could put into his denunciation of the behavior of the mob, nobody was permitted to hear the speakers supporting the plank presented by the minority. But all of the oratory, whether heard or not, did not change a single delegate vote, and the "dripping wet" plank was adopted by a vote of 934¾ to 213¼.

NEW INTEREST IN LONG-PASSED RACE

Neanderthal Study Revived by Scientists.

The recent announcement made by George Grant McCurdy, director of the American School of Prehistoric Research, that three Neanderthal skeletons had been unearthed at the foot of Mt. Carmel, near Haifa, Palestine, has focused new attention on this long extinct race. Not only does the find confirm recent archeological theories concerning the antiquity of human domination in that part of the world, but it also promises a wealth of new information about this ancient people.

Neanderthal men seem to have been the sole representatives of the human race in Europe in the last glacial epoch, but until recently no sign of these men or their characteristic culture, known as the Mcusterian, had been found elsewhere. Following the discovery at Dusseldorf, skulls and stone implements of Neanderthal type were discovered at Gibraltar, at several places in France, in Jersey, Malta, Moravia and Croatia. Implements and other indications of Neanderthal inhabitation, but no skeletons, have also been found in England.

The date of Neanderthal occupation in Europe may be estimated as extending from 40,000 to 20,000 B. C., though some archeologists believe that the period was much longer—perhaps measurable in hundreds of thousands of years. In any case, this now extinct race undoubtedly inhabited Europe and Asia Minor for a period at least as long as that in which succeeding races have inhabited it. Their culture, such as it was, certainly dominated these regions for thousands of years, and was replaced by that of the Cro-Magnon people—and essentially modern type of man—only after the retreat of the great ice front made it possible for a less hardy human type to survive.

Dr. Ernest A. Hooton, of Harvard university, recently described the Neanderthal as "a human type that is distinctly anthropoid in jaw protrusion and chinlessness. They made several varieties of flaked flint implements with finely retouched edges; they buried their dead with some ceremony, and they contested successfully with the cave bear the tenancy of caverns with southern exposures."

Until recently, it was supposed that the Neanderthal race held sway only in Europe, since no remains had been discovered elsewhere. In 1925, however, part of a Neanderthal skull was found by F. Turville Petrie, a young archeologist, while he was excavating a large cave on the western shore of Lake Galilee.

This discovery stirred archeologists to a more thorough search for traces of ancient man in the caves of Palestine. One of the most famous workers was Miss Dorothy A. E. Garrod, who had charge of a joint expedition sent by the American School of Prehistoric Research and the British School of Archeology. Miss Garrod found in a cave near Athlit extensive remains of early man, dating back until the Neanderthal period, and giving a more or less connected history of the various human cultures that existed in that region from about 40,000 years ago to the present.

In the upper layers of the sediment in this cave, which is known by natives as "Mugharet-el-Wad," were relics of civilization from the Bronze age to the present. Beneath this layer was a stratum designated as Mesolithic, and lower still were succeeding layers of cave earth filled with traces of fire and ancient feasts, implements of stone and burials. Each layer revealed an earlier stage in human development until at a depth of nearly 24 feet from the surface of the cave's interior at the beginning of excavation, the relics of Neanderthal occupation were unearthed.

This Man Had Faith Lost 24 Pounds

"Last November I weighed 192 lbs. Today, (February 5th, 1932) I am down to 168 lbs. and full of pep all day long—since using Kruschen I have not had to use the laxative that was customary."—Theo. A. C. LaFleur, Providence, R. I.

What do you think of this—you men who doubt—you stay fat—because you want to think that nature made you that way.

You're all wrong—most fat men were made fat because of their ability to handle a knife and fork in a business like manner.

Be frank with yourself. Are you too timid to take a safe, harmless conditioner that not only takes off surplus fat but is so helpful that it makes you feel years younger?

To reduce safely take one-half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water before breakfast every morning—cut down on fatty meats, potatoes and sweets. Kruschen is sold by druggists the world over. A jar that costs but a trifle will last four weeks—but be sure you get Kruschen—your health comes first.

Kindergarten's History

The kindergarten was suggested and organized by Frederick Froebel, a German educationalist, around the middle of the Nineteenth century. The first kindergarten was opened by Froebel in the year 1840 in the village of Blakenburg, in the Thuringian forest. The pioneer movement for the establishment of kindergartens in the United States was led by Miss Elizabeth Peabody of Boston, who on becoming interested in Froebel's writings, went to Germany in 1867 to study his system. The first public kindergarten was opened in Boston in 1870, but shortly abandoned. The first permanent successful attempt to make the kindergarten a part of the public school system was begun in St. Louis in 1873 under the leadership of Miss Susan Blow and Dr. W. T. Harris.

Loses Home by Fire

Oscar Erickson and family had the misfortune of losing their home and everything that was in it on Sunday night, July 10. They had had fire in the kitchen stove at supper time and shortly afterwards they went to the Bert Curtis home to spend the night and, upon their return home they found it all burned to the ground.

As far as their neighbors can tell, they thot that they saw reflection of a fire before midnight on that date which leads to believe that the house may have caught fire from the stove some way after they left.

Post Office Day July 26

Postmaster Gilbert Sanoden will observe "Post Office Day" on Tuesday, July 26, when the building will be decorated with flags, bunting, pictures of George Washington and other noted Americans. Every post office in the country will be similarly decorated.

July 26, 1776, is a red letter day in the history of the postal service, as it was on that day that the Continental Congress, meeting in Philadelphia, provided for the establishment of the postal service and named Benjamin Franklin as the first postmaster general.

Method of Feeding Cows Avoids Late Summer Milk Slump

By Robert Roemer
Larimer County, Colorado

Most of the blame for the milk slump of late July, August and September usually is laid to heat and flies. In part, this is warranted, but poor pastures should take a large share of the blame, as the system I have worked out proves.

When cows go into our pastures in the Cache la Poudre valley, barn feeding continues in the usual way. Hay consumption drops from 15 to 17 pounds a cow daily to 4 or 5 pounds. For a time, grain is fed as usual, 1 pound to 3 pounds of milk. A little later, with pastures in their prime, grain is cut to a pound for each 4 or 5 pounds of milk, with requirements of each cow in mind. (Continued next week)

COLOMBIA—THE TREASURE LAND OF SOUTH AMERICA

Republic Is a Large Producer of Emeralds, Platinum, Gold, Oil and Coffee.

One thousand miles south from the tip of Florida is a treasure land, covering an area about the size of the State of Texas, which is rapidly coming into prominence in the world of commerce.

This "El Dorado" is the Republic of Colombia, South America. Within its boundaries—the Atlantic ocean, on the north; Ecuador, Peru and Brazil, on the south; Venezuela and Brazil, on the east, and the Pacific ocean on the west—there are nearly a half million square miles of fertile land productive of not only a great variety of food products, but of gems and minerals of inestimable quantity and value as well.

Colombia ranks first in world production of emeralds; second of platinum; third of bananas; is the largest South American producer of gold, and is one of the largest prospective oil producers of the world. It also raises large quantities of tobacco, rubber, sugar cane, cotton, wheat, rice, pineapples, peaches—in fact, all the crops common to both the temperate and tropic zones. Cattle raising is an important industry of the republic, there now being more than 7,500,000 head on its spacious ranges.

Coffee Leading Product.

The most outstanding product of the country, however, is coffee. Colombia is the second largest coffee-producing nation, and its coffees are recognized as the finest in the world. That these coffees are rapidly gaining popularity in the United States is evidenced by the fact that Colombian exports of its famed grades, known as "milds," to this country have increased 30 per cent since 1927. According to statistics compiled by the United States Department of Commerce, Colombian coffees now represent 35 per cent of the value of the product imported into this country from all sources during 1931. America consumes more than nine-tenths of Colombia's entire coffee crop annually.

Although it lies in the tropic zone, Colombia enjoys practically every climate in the world—from summer heat to perpetual spring or perpetual winter. The country is crossed by three ranges of the Andean mountain system, which are designated as the Eastern, Central and Western Cordillera.

THE MACHINE AGE SPOILS A PROPHECY

A NOTED British scientist forecast thirty years ago that by 1931 all available wheat land in the world would be under cultivation, and if the yields per acre could not be increased beyond that which then prevailed there would be a world shortage. The average yield then was 12.7 bushels per acre. During the past seven years, the world over, it has been 14.1. On the 320,000,000 acres in cultivation this increase would amount to almost a half billion bushels more production than the world standards of thirty years ago. In place of dire distress due to shortage, we have had dire distress due to surplus.

Wheat farmers have shown no great inclination to curtail materially their output; perhaps a 10% decline compared with 70% reduction in steel. This unwillingness, or perhaps inability, to adjust production to current needs makes the problem all the harder to solve.

Not only are we now growing more wheat per unit of land, but acreage has been very greatly extended. In twenty years Canada has increased acreage 250%. Australia almost as much. Another significant fact is the materially lessened use of wheat. A much more diversified diet has developed. More vegetables and fruits are used than formerly. The reduction of 1.2 bushels consumed per person per annum since the last generation necessitates nearly 150,000,000 bushels less wheat than was formerly required.

Machines Increase Supply

The factor that has exerted the most potent influence in this rising world flood of grain has been the rapid development of the machine. The old days of the cradle required from thirty to forty hours of hand labor to harvest an acre of grain. Then came the binder, which reduced the process to four or five hours per acre. Now the combine does the work in forty-five minutes per acre.

Where it used to cost ten cents a bushel merely to thresh the grain, the modern combine cuts and threshes at a cost ranging from 3 to 5 cents a bushel. With this reduced cost of production, the possibility of acreage expansion is tremendous. Lands heretofore regarded as worthless except for grazing have recently come into competition with the older wheat belts.

The Russian Effort

Within the past two or three years another disturbing element has come into the picture. Soviet Russia is attempting a comeback fraught with possibility that cannot yet be fully evaluated. Russia is eagerly utilizing the very latest of scientific knowledge to enlarge her agricultural possibilities. With feverish anxiety she is literally pouring millions into the expansion of her university research institutes, experimental stations and breeding farms. Her scientists are combing the earth for new crops and new methods. No country in Europe is manifesting more interest and activity in laying hold of the best science, wherever it may be found.

It is of more than passing interest that the wheat yields reported on the huge trust farm known as the "Giant" ran last year as much as 18 bushels to the acre. On this single farm the crop harvested is reported to have been 3,865,000 bushels. A single farm of 427,000 acres under government control and mechanized as fast as human energy can be applied is a new factor in the world's picture.

There can be but little doubt that the Russian situation may yet assume quite a different attitude from what obtained even in pre-war days.

A crew of men remodeled the interior and repainted the Great Northern Depot here, changing it from red to the present color.

Dr. J. T. Turley, dentist, began making regular professional visits to Holt, and advertised special low prices, among which were silver fillings for 75c, platinum fillings for $1, and gold, $5.

The hay crop was light everywhere but in Mud Lake.

The famous "Murder or Suicide?" article was published. (We reprinted this in 1925.) Alf. Skjevland of Newfolden lost a little pug dog in Holt on the Fourth. The dog was found several days later in an old well near the creamery. Editor Latta opined that the "purp" might have been murdered by a fellow-dog for voicing too vehemently his remarks about the baseball game on the Fourth, or else committed suicide on account of it. "Being a pug," Editor Latta continues, "he was probably pugnacious—now he isn't. Pete Anderson, the buttermaker here, and Les Silbaugh, his assistant, will swear that when he was found he was not only dead, but terribly turned up and wrinkled. He had a turned up point at each end before he turned up missing, and had turned up his toes before he finally turned up dead."

Such Is Life!

Man comes into this world without his consent and leaves it against his will. During his stay on earth his time is spent in one continuous round of contraries and misunderstandings by the balance of the species.

In his infancy he is an angel; in his boyhood he is a devil; in his manhood he is everything from a lizard up; in his duties he is a fool; if he raises a family he is a chump; if he raises a small check he is a thief, and the law raises the devil with him; if he is a poor man he is a poor manager and has no sense; if he is rich, he is dishonest, but considered smart; if he is in politics, you can't place him, as he is an undesirable citizen; if he goes to church he is a hypocrite; if he stays away from church he is a poor sinner; if he donates to foreign missions he does it for a show; if he doesn't, he is stingy and a tight wad.

When he first comes into the world, everybody wants to kiss him; before he goes out, they want to kick him.

If he dies young, there was a great future before him; if he lives to a ripe old age, he is simply in the way and living to save funeral expenses.

Yes, sir! Life is a funny road, but we all like to travel it just the same—if for no other reason just to see what the halifax is going to happen next.—Con.

FAITH

Nothing is impossible to the man who has faith. Faith moves mountains.

Every dark cloud has a silver lining. It is well to observe the darkness but let us not overlook the light—the bright spots. Worry sinks us deeper into our misfortunes. What is needed most is sober thought and judgment and a happy outlook upon life. Why buy misery?

Every depression is followed by a period of prosperity. Hogs, butterfat, eggs and grains have been almost valueless before. Remember, it is impossible to have profits without some losses occasionally. Happiness is all the more sweet because of some sorrow.

Let's forget our troubles with a little faith in the future and with a clear mind divorced of fear and worry we will win and be happy.

SYNOPSIS

Wilson McCann, young Arizona ranchman, finds an old friend, Jim Yerby, with a broken leg. Julia Stark, daughter of Matthew Stark, inveterate enemy of the McCanns, is rendering first aid. Taking a note from Julia to her father, Wilson is fired on by Jasper, Julia's brother. On the way from Yerby's place to her home, Julia learns her companion's identity and dismisses him in anger, the old feud rankling. Ann Gifford, with her young sister, Ethel, are sheep raisers, and on that account unpopular with the cattlemen. "Night riders" burn a cabin and shoot a McCann ranch hand. Peter McCann, Wilson's father, offers a reward for the disclosure of their identity. Wilson McCann horsewhips Jasper, he making practically no resistance. Matthew disowns his son for his cowardice, and posts notice he will kill Wilson McCann on sight. Ann Gifford's tragedy is the fate of her dead sister, Nora, betrayed and abandoned by her lover. Jasper Stark and Carl Gitner, known as a "killer," a rider for the Stark ranch, hold secret conferences. A Stark ranch hand, Tom McArdle, slain a short time previously, is believed by the Starks to have been killed by the McCanns, but rumor links his name with that of Nora Gifford.

Because he found himself weakening he took refuge in temper. "Well, you'll not go. You'll stay right here at home. I'll show you whether I can't go off this ranch without being tagged by you or some one else. You drop this interferin' in my affairs, Jule, an' behave yoreself. I won't have it."

He swung her round by the shoulders and started her toward the house.

As he got into the buckboard Phil gave him information. "Red says he saw Wils McCann at the ditch gates above the Three Cottonwoods. He may not be alone. Better let me go, too, Dad."

Matt Stark flung a couple of crisp questions at the cowpuncher and announced his decision. "You'll stay here, Phil. This is my job, an' I'm going to attend to it right now if he's still there. Let go." This last to the wrangler at the head of the dancing colts.

The young horses dashed down the road, racing at top sped.

Already Phil was saddling a horse he found in the stable. He rode to the house, swung off, and ran inside.

Julia met him coming out of his room carrying a rifle.

"Where you going?" she asked breathlessly.

"Wils McCann is down above the Three Cottonwoods. Pretends to be fixin' up the ditch gates. When he came by awhile ago Red saw him. Likely he's waitin' to get Dad if he comes along. I've got to get there before Dad does, so I'm takin' the hill trail."

Her heart contracted with a swift spasm of fear. "Let me go, too, Phil."

"No. What can you do? Besides, I can't wait."

He brushed past her, pulled himself to the saddle, and was off instantly at a gallop.

For a moment Julia stood, palsied by dread. Then, with a strong resurgence of courage, she followed Phil out of the house and ran to the stable.

"Get my saddle all ready," she cried to Sam Sharp the wrangler as she snatched up a rope and flew to the corral.

Julia led her mount to the gate where the wrangler was waiting with saddle, bridle, and blanket.

The man slapped on the blanket, adjusted the saddle, and cinched it expertly. Julia kept urging him to hurry.

"What's all this racin' an' hurry about?" he wanted to know.

"That Wils McCann is down the road waiting for Dad. We just heard it."

"Where?"

"At the ditch above Three Cottonwoods."

She called this back over her shoulder as the pony found its stride.

Julia swung into the cut-off that led to the hills. She rode fast, not sparing the horse, for an urgent spur was driving her. If she could arrive in time she might avert a tragedy. Just how, she did not know, but she would find a way. It was not possible that they would kill each other if she flung herself between them. Surely they would not do that.

The buckskin she rode was a good traveler, but she seemed to crawl over the ground. The hills were steep and rough, the declivities sharp. She deflected, trying to save a few hundred yards, and presently found herself in a thicket of cactus and mesquite that grew more dense as she proceeded.

Out of this she worked, desperately aware that she had wasted invaluable minutes. An open draw offered promise of faster progress. This led to a pocket, the sides of which were precipitous.

It was just as she reached the summit that the sound of a shot appalled her. She spurred the buckskin in the direction from which the report had come, recklessly, careless of danger of a fall from the plunging horse. All her being was obsessed by terror. Fear for those she loved rose in her and choked her.

The pony swung round a clump of bushes and shied so violently that Julia was almost unseated. A man was stooping over something that lay huddled on the ground. The girl dragged the animal to a halt and flung herself from the saddle. As she ran back she noticed that the man held a rifle in his hand. He straightened and turned toward her.

The man was Wilson McCann.

In his rigid face her fear-filled eyes read confirmation of what she had dreaded. She looked down—and from her throat there leaped an anguished cry. The stricken figure at their feet was that of her father. In the center of his forehead was a small round hole. He was dead beyond any question of doubt.

CHAPTER V

Enemies Meet

Julia wailed "Oh Daddy—Daddy!" as she went down to her knees beside the lax body.

Wilson McCann waited for the first emotional outburst to spend itself. This was no place for him. He knew that. The drumming hoofs of his horse should be putting miles between him and the scene of this tragedy. But he had something to tell her, as soon as she was in a condition to listen. Besides, he could not leave her alone with her dead while she was still hysterical.

A twig snapped. Instantly McCann stiffened to alert and crouched wariness. The weapon in his hand shifted ever so little, but that scarcely perceptible movement meant that he was ready. His eyes searched the chaparral foot by foot.

The sun glistened on a rifle barrel. At once McCann moved swiftly so as to place the girl's horse between him and that shining tube of steel.

Out of the brush a face peered, searching the landscape. The shifting eyes found in the same instant of time both McCann and the grief-stricken girl, and a second later the supine figure over which her grief was spending itself.

Julia had looked up when McCann ran for the shelter of the horse's body. She glanced round quickly, caught sight of the gleaming gun barrel, and rose hurriedly.

"Look out, Phil. He's killed Dad," she cried, in a panic of terror.

Without a thought for her own safety she ran straight across the open toward the mesquite thicket to protect her brother.

A shot rang out. McCann crumpled up behind the horse. Julia heard herself cry out, and even in that moment of fear felt a sense of puzzled wonder. For she had been looking at Phil and she was sure he had not fired.

Phil dragged her down behind him. "He's layin' a trap for me," he told her, almost in a whisper.

But Julia, looking over his shoulder, knew this could not be. For the man's head lay in the sand, his rifle six feet away by the fall.

Again there came the crack of a rifle.

"He's dead, but you didn't shoot," she murmured, horrified.

"Can't be dead," the boy answered. "How can he?"

"Some one shot—and neither you nor he did. I'm going to see."

"No," he protested.

But she was gone before he could stop her. Phil scrambled to his feet and followed.

One glance at McCann was enough to show that this was no ruse. He lay still, either dead or unconscious. The boy stooped and found where a bullet had gone through the shirt.

"He was shot from behind, looks like," he said.

"But—who?" Julia asked, white to the lips.

"Jas maybe." Phil said it reluctantly. "I saw some one dodging in the chaparral. Looked like Jas, but maybe it wasn't. Anyhow, I stopped to find out an' he slipped away. I wish to God I hadn't. I might a-been on time."

They had walked over to the place where their father lay and were kneeling beside him. With her handkerchief Julia wiped from the forehead of the cattleman the little stain of blood showing where the bullet had entered his head. Her slim body was shaken with sobs. The face of the boy was working with emotion. The blow was staggering. The virile dominant personality of their father would never again rule their activities. He had gone out of life as the flame of a blown candle vanishes.

"One of us 'll have to go get the wagon," Phil said presently in an unsteady voice. "Dad musta left it somewhere near."

"Yes. You go, Phil."

She was clinging to him, quivering with grief.

They cried in each other's arms. After a little, Phil spoke gruffly, ashamed of his own distress. "I'll be moving. Sure you don't mind stayin' alone, Sis?"

"No. I want to stay."

"I'll leave Dad's rifle with you. Not that you'll need it." He tested the mechanism to make sure it was in order. "He hadn't fired a shot. McCann got him from the chaparral, don't you reckon?" Then, with a high sobbing note in his voice, "By G—d, this'll be a bad day for the McCanns."

"Yes." In that monosyllable she concentrated all the passionate desire for vengeance in her young heart.

Phil disappeared among the mesquite bushes, and after a minute Julia heard the sound of a moving horse thrashing about in the brush.

The sun was shining on a land peaceful as old age. She could hear the faint twitter of birds. Nothing had changed, yet everything had changed. Something had gone out of her life that would never come back. An hour ago she had been a girl, gay and carefree, singing at her work. That happy irresponsibility was gone forever. She was no longer a girl but a sad-eyed woman.

Julia covered her father's face with his own bandana. She did it to keep the sun out of his eyes, even though no light could ever be bright enough now to trouble them.

A slight stir made her turn. Wilson McCann had rolled over and was looking at her. For a moment the two gazed at each other, neither speaking.

"I didn't kill him," he said at last, feebly.

"You murdered him from ambush," she charged.

"No. I heard a shot. I came an' found him lying there." The weakness was wholly physical. The steely eyes did not flinch in the least.

"I hope you'll die as he did, without a chance for your life," she cried in a low bitter voice.

"I reckon I'll do that . . . soon. But first . . . I'd like to set this straight. I didn't kill yore father."

"Weren't you waiting here to—to murder him?" she cried in a passion of horror.

There was a look in his eyes she did not understand. It was as though he knew something he did not mean to tell her, as though he were actually pitying her.

Silently He Watched Her.

"I told you . . . if I had to do it . . . that it would be in the open. He was shot from the chaparral."

She did not believe that he was guiltless. She could not think that. And yet—

"What do you mean?" she asked.

His head sank into the sand and his eyes closed.

Reluctantly she moved toward him, drawn by his great need. He was the enemy of her house, the one who had brought disaster irretrievable to it. But he was, she believed, a dying man. The eternal mother was in that hour stronger in her than the daughter of her father.

She knelt beside him, looking for the wounds. A stain of wet blood in the back of the shirt showed that he had been shot from behind. The sight of it gave her a little shock, for she recalled what Phil had said about seeing some one who looked like Jasper. And he had told her, Jasper had, that he intended to get Wils McCann. Had he done it? She hoped not. Murder from the chaparral was a dreadful thing, a crime wholly alien to the frank and passionate temperament of the girl.

Water was needed, and Julia had not brought a canteen. She took the dusty hat of the man and ran to the canal, where she filled it with water. This she carried back carefully.

In one of his pockets she found a knife and used it to cut away the soaked shirt clinging to the wound. With the handkerchief taken from her neck she bathed the muscular back. Apparently he had been shot through the lung, well up near the shoulder, and in the right side.

The eyes of the wounded man flickered open and fastened on her. She was now sponging his face and temples with a clean strip torn from the handkerchief. Silently he watched her. As he lay there weakly it seemed to him that some healing property passed from her to him through them. It came as a conviction that he was not going to die, that he would get well.

He did not ask what she meant to do with him. It was possible she might think she had answered sufficiently the call upon her humanity and leave him here to perish. It was possible that after she had gone the man who had shot him would creep up through the bushes and make an end of him. But he did not believe that either of these would occur. She would look after him somehow, even though she thought he had killed her father. He must set her straight on that. He could not let her go on thinking it.

"I didn't kill yore father," he said a second time.

"Even if you didn't, what's the difference? Your friends did. You were here waiting for him."

"No," he denied. "I was alone—none of my folks was with me."

"I don't believe it. If you didn't fire the shot you know who did." She said it in all the bitterness of green young grief.

And instantly she knew, as her eyes challenged his, that she had hit upon the truth. He had not himself shot her father, but he could give her the name of the man who had done it. Her heart hardened. She rose, turned her back upon him, and walked away. He had lied to her. He was as guilty as though his own finger had pulled the trigger.

The minutes dragged. Julia could not get the wounded man out of her mind, even when she was stooping over the body of her father and brushing flies from the folded hands. Perhaps he had died since she had left him. Suddenly she could stand it no longer. Quickly she walked back to him. His quiet eyes met hers.

"Are you thirsty?" she asked.

"Yes."

Again she took his hat for water. She held it to his lips while he drank, supporting his head with one arm beneath it.

There came at last the sound of wagon wheels. She called, to direct the driver of the buckboard. The rig jolted into sight. Her brother Phil had brought with him Sam Sharp, the stableman.

They put the body of Matthew Stark into the wagon.

Hard-eyed, Phil looked at his wounded enemy. "What about him?" he asked harshly.

"We'll take him home with us," Julia said. "We can't leave him here. He's a dying man, you know. We'll take him to the ranch and send word to his father."

"What for?" the boy wanted to know. "We can send word he's here."

Unexpectedly McCann opened his eyes and spoke. "That would be better."

"A d—n sight better, an' if you die before he gets here it'll suit me fine," Phil flung out bitterly.

"We're going to take him with us, Phil," his sister answered. "We can't leave him here. I hate him as much as you do, but it would be inhuman to go and leave him. I'll not do it."

Sharp backed his young mistress. "That's right, Phil. I reckon we got to take him."

They lifted him up and put him beside the dead man.

McCann's face was touched by an acridly sardonic smile. "You're all plumb good Samaritans," he murmured.

Phil had galloped ahead to prepare the ranch for the homecoming of him who had ruled as autocrat for many years. Among those gathered were Dominick Rafferty, the foreman, and the Texans, Stone and Gitner.

Rafferty scowled at the wounded McCann. "What about this buzzard?" he asked callously. "What's the idea in bringin' him here? Couldn't you bump him off where he was at?"

Julia was white to the lips. The ordeal of bringing back her father had proved almost more than she could endure. "Don't talk like that, Dominick," she begged tremulously.

"How you want him to talk?" Gitner asked with an ugly sneer. "Do you figure we'll let this hombre get away with what he's done?"

Julia flashed one look of anger at the Texan. "You'll do as you're told, Carl Gitner, or you'll get your time."

"You're boss now, are you?" the big Texan snarled.

"Don't push on yore reins, Carl," advised Rafferty.

Boy and man, the foreman of the Circle Cross had been with Stark for more than thirty years. He was devoted to him and his family. Even though he might not approve of what they had done he had no intention of siding with anybody against them.

Julia took control of the arrangements. "Take Father to his own room," she gave orders. "And carry this man to Jasper's room. Will you send some one for Doctor Sanders, Dominick?"

Before the doctor left town on his way to the Circle Cross it was known all over Mesa that Wils McCann had got Matt Stark and that he was himself desperately wounded and a prisoner in the hands of the enemy. Within two hours it had reached the Flying VY and Peter McCann was organizing a rescue party.

"Better go kinda easy to start with," Wes Tapscott suggested. "I figure we're aimin' to spy out the land this trip an' not exactly call for a showdown. This business asks for some deep-plomacy, as the papers say."

"We'll three of us go—you an' Lyn an' me," McCann decided. "An' Dusty will follow with a wagon to bring the boy home."

"If we get him," amended the foreman.

"If they don't give him up I'll round up the boys an' tear the ranch house to pieces," Peter answered, his mouth set grimly and his eyes hard as jade.

"Sure you will, an' we'll find the boy's body when we finally get in. There's more'n one way to skin a cat, Peter McCann. If you set any store by that boy—an' I reckon you do—I'd not run on the rope today, by gum. I'd jest naturally act like I was mighty sorry the way things had turned out an'—"

"You want me to tell the Starks that Wils was to blame—after the old man had posted him all over the country? That it?"

"Not exactly, Pete. But play yore cards close. Lemme ride ahead an' see how things stack up. I'll bring Doc Sanders out to you an'—"

"I'm not going home without seeing Wils. You can't talk me outa that, Wes."

Privately Tapscott was of opinion that the Starks would never let McCann into their house alive. It was not reasonable to expect it, with old Matt lying there dead at the hands of Peter's son. But he did not say so bluntly.

"We'll see how it works out. Maybe they'll be willin' to let us move Wils. Tell you our play is to smooth down their fur till we got Wils safe in our hands. A deef an' dumb blind man would get that without argument, Pete."

McCann recognized the justice of his foreman's views. The situation was so delicate that it must be handled with wisdom to prevent an explosion that might be fatal to Wilson. Figuratively speaking, he threw up his hands.

"All right, Wes. I reckon' you're right. You run it an' let's see where we get off at."

Peter MCann and his son Lyn waited at the pass above the Circle Cross while Wes Tapscott rode down into the valley alone. He rode leisurely across the open and swung from the saddle. He was conscious that at least two men watched him. One was at the corral, the other lounging in the doorway of the house. Tapscott did not tie to the shiny bar, even with a slip knot. He might have to leave in a hurry. So he dropped the reins to the ground. Practically speaking, this would fasten the cow pony until he gathered up the reins again.

Tapscott jingled his way houseward with the bowlegged swing of the dismounted horseman of the plains. "Hello the house!" he called.

The man in the doorway was Phil Stark. He was no longer lounging. He stood straight, face keen as a blade.

"What you doing here?" he demanded.

Then, before the words had died on his lips, he ran swiftly down the steps and joined the Flying VY man. For there had come a puff of smoke, the spit of a bullet striking sand. The man running from the corral had fired.

Tapscott turned swiftly, hand on gun. But he did not draw. Phil Stark was between him and Carl Gitner.

"Put up that gun," the boy ordered the Texan. "Don't you see he's here as a messenger?"

"I see he's Wes Tapscott. Tha's enough for me," the hired bully answered heavily. "Get outa the way there, boy, or I won't be responsible."

A slim figure flashed past Tapscott and joined Phil.

"Don't you dare shoot," Julia cried.

Out of the men's bunkhouse came Stone and at his heels Rafferty.

Great "Roman Holiday" Staged on Alban Lake

In the year 51 A. D., the great tunnel which was to drain the Alban lake was completed, and the Emperor Claudius celebrated it with a characteristic Roman spectacle. He gave a mimic naval battle on the lake, repeating upon a much larger scale a similar spectacle Augustus had given. Claudius manned two opposing fleets with 19,000 men. Some of the galleys had three and four banks of oars. Around the shores of the lake troops were stationed to see that none of the naval gladiators escaped.

An immense multitude of people from Rome and the neighboring towns gathered to see the battle. The banks, the slopes and the hilltops were crowded with spectators, so that the scene resembled a vast theater. The emperor, dressed in a splendid military cloak, and his wife, Agrippina, also wearing a military cloak, presided. The men who did the fighting were criminals and slaves. History tells us that in this sanguinary conflict the combatants, possibly animated by expectations of freedom, fought bravely. It was they who coined the famous Latin salute: "Hail, Emperor! We who are about to die salute thee."

Dog's Status Unjust

The fact that in ancient unsanitary days, numbers of mongrel wolf-like dogs were allowed to haunt the streets of hot eastern cities to act the part of scavengers and disposers of garbage of all sorts, thievish, snarling creatures kicked about by everyone, put them into the lowest class of the brutes. To cast anything to the dogs was to consign it to infamy as deep as could be imagined. We have a relic of that feeling in the expression "gone to the dogs," applied to one who has lost all or become outcast

"Ski" Idea Not New

Implements for the purpose served by the modern "ski" were used by many nations of antiquity. Xenophon describes the shoes or pattens of skins with which the horses of the Armenians were shod to prevent them from sinking into the snow, and Procopius made mention of the ancient Lapps, known in Scandinavia as Skrid-Finnen, or sliders. Snowshoes have always been used by the Mongols of northwestern Asia. From the evidence of the old Norse sagas they must have been general in Scandinavia long before the Christian era. Ulf or Ullar, the god of winter, is always spoken of as walking upon skiis, the curved toes of which gave rise to the legend that they were really ships upon which the god was wafted over hill and dale.

Hamlet's Sanity

Whether or not Hamlet was insane is a question which has disturbed critics for 300 years. It is interesting to know that most of the profound thinkers who have given the question deep consideration regard Hamlet as sane. It would seem that if Hamlet was insane there is no point to the drama.—Washington Star.

Mercolized Wax Keeps Skin Young

Get an ounce and use as directed. Fine particles of aged skin peel off until all defects such as pimples, liver spots, tan and freckles disappear. Skin is then soft and velvety. United States Volcanoes

There are few active volcanoes in the United States at the present time, but a number have become extinct within times geographically recent. There was an eruption of Tres Virgines, Calif., in 1857. Mount Lassen renewed its activity mildly a few years ago. Mount Hood, in Oregon, exhales vapor, as does also Mount Rainier, in Washington. Mount St. Helena, Wash., was in eruption in 1841-42 and Mount Baker, also in Washington, was reported active in 1843.

Man Lost 26 Pounds Looks 100% Better

Feels Stronger Than Ever

Just to prove to any doubtful man or woman that Kruschen Salts is the SAFE way to reduce—let us take the letter of Mr. F. J. Fritz of Cincinnati, Ohio, recently received.

He writes: "I've tried extreme dieting, setting up exercises with very little results—but the results from Kruschen are almost incredible. In 3 months I reduced from 205 to 179 pounds and feel stronger than ever—no more wheezing or gasping for breath—friends say I look 100% better."

Bear in mind, you fat man, that there is danger in too much fat—try the safe way to reduce—one-half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water every morning—cut down on fatty meats and sweets—one bottle that lasts 4 weeks costs but a trifle—get it at any drugstore in the world.

Vital Spark Slow in Leaving Body

Accidents frequently happen in which the victim seems to have been fatally injured, and yet the vital organs have not wholly ceased to function. Respiration may cease and the heart stop functioning, producing a state of physiologic death, during which time the victim may sometimes be revived by the proper administration of artificial respiration.

This may occur in such accidents as drowning, electrocution and asphyxiation, and in some motor car accidents. The unfortunate and apparently dead victims may not actually die for some time following the accident.

Von Hoesslin reported before the Berlin Medical society that the electrocardiograph has demonstrated regular contractions of the heart continuing as long as 30 minutes after physiologic death occurs. The contractions are strongest immediately following the accident, and grow weaker gradually until the heart ceases entirely to function, except for occasional contractions, which occur at irregular intervals. Therefore, it would be the period immediately following the accident that normal life may be restored by artificial respiration.

Dr. Samuel R. Benedict of the Alabama Power company believes that many persons have died following injuries when they might have been resuscitated if artificial respiration had been promptly administered.—Journal of the American Medical Association.

New Target Gives Score

Marksmen may learn their scores instantly from a target recently invented in Germany. When a bullet hits a numbered ring its corresponding number appears automatically at the side of the target. The rings are of steel and a standard paper target is placed over them. Numbers run from 10, indicating a bull's eye, down to 1, on the outer ring.

"Company From America" Appreciated in Orient

Anybody might claim to be widely known and appreciated for whom a native of Shanghai would build an addition to his home, hopeful of a visit some time. That's just the position in which Dr. Samuel J. Bradenburg of Clark university and Mrs. Brandenburg find themselves.

When Dr. George H. Blakeslee reached Shanghai recently on his mission for Uncle Sam, he hunted up Lee Su, who formerly was a student at Clark. The young man showed Doctor Blakeslee a wing he had just added to his already luxurious home and said Doctor and Mrs. Brandenburg had promised to visit him some day, and he had the rooms prepared, ready for their coming, "company from America" for whom the best is none too good in the Orient.—Worcester Telegram.

What kind of food builds a

100% BABY?

READ WHAT 50 BABIES TAUGHT TWO SCIENTISTS

OF COURSE, you want your baby to be a rosy, healthy baby . . . taking his food contentedly . . . putting on his ounces regularly.

Yet you're hoping even more, perhaps, that he's building now for future health. Building hard bones, good teeth, strong muscles, sound nerves—to make him fit and fine in the years to come.

When mother's milk fails, can any other food build such a baby? . . . Read of a recent scientific test.

World-famous clinic makes feeding test

Recently, two baby specialists made a test with 50 average infants. Into these babies' bottles—month after month—went a food famous for 75 years as a baby builder. Millions of healthy citizens are living testimonials of its benefits. Yet never before had such a thorough, modern test of this food been made.

This food was . . . Eagle Brand Milk. Throughout the test, it was the only milk these babies received. The usual supplementary foods* were used.

And how those babies were studied! X-ray pictures of bones were taken. Tooth formation was watched. Blood counts were made. Weights and heights were charted. And at last came the report.

By every known test, these babies showed themselves splendidly nourished. This simple diet—Eagle Brand, with the usual supplementary foods—had proved itself equal to the building of a 100% baby.*

If you cannot nurse your baby, try Eagle Brand. Next to mother's milk, it is the easiest form of milk in the world to digest. Mail coupon for new free booklet on all phases of baby care.

*The usual supplementary foods (used with any milk diet) are orange or tomato juice, and cod-liver oil or other source of the anti-rachitic vitamin D.

Points scientists look for in judging a baby

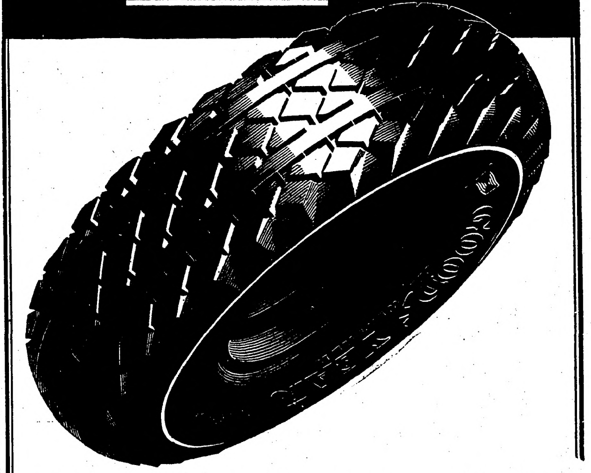
FIRST-CHOICE or SECOND-choice



Which tire will you buy at the same low price?

Why do you suppose that Goodyear Tires lead all others in public preference by better than two to one?

Why do you suppose that more people ride on Goodyear Tires than on any other kind—and have for 17 years?

These tires must be FIRST-CHOICE because they're better.

They must outsell all other tires in the world because they outrun them on the road.

On a straight quality basis, then, it certainly looks like common sense to buy FIRST-CHOICE tires.

Which brings up the question, "how about price?"

Most of the best things on the market naturally cost more than the second-raters.

But here's the amazing fact about tires:

You can get the safety, the quality, the extra life and trouble-free mileage of the world's greatest tire at no extra cost.

Think that over when someone tries to high-pressure you into buying an unknown or doubtful bargain.

Just ask him this simple question: "Why should I pay good money for any second-choice tire when FIRST-CHOICE costs no more?"

VILLAGE HAS HAD ITS DAY OF GLORY

Old Tadoussac Now Quiet Summer Resort.

The oldest white settlement in America, and once the center of the American fur trade, the quaint little French Canadian village of Tadoussac, on the lower St. Lawrence river, is today a quiet Canadian summer resort.

Nestling among the foothills of the blue-capped Laurentian mountains at the junction of the St. Lawrence and Saguena rivers, the village itself is still living in the past, the natural beauty of its surroundings and the quaintness of its people attracting each summer a large number of holidayers who are seeking to leave behind the rush and bustle of modern life.

Woven around Tadoussac is a long and romantic history. Here Jacques Cartier, the first explorer of New France, landed in the summer of 1535, and there are numerous tales of visits by those fierce sea rovers, the Vikings, at a much earlier date. Tadoussac, with its natural protected harbor, was long used as a whaling station by the Basques and Bretons, who were the first to form a settlement there, and it was in 1599 that the first house in Canada was built.

At the opening of the century, Tadoussac became the center of the fur trading industry, which extended as far as Labrador and Hudson bay. The first trading post of the Hudson Bay company, that great company of gentlemen adventurers, was erected on the site where the modern Hotel Tadoussac now stands.

In 1603, Champlain landed at Tadoussac and made his disastrous treaty with the Algonquins, thus incurring the enmity of the warlike Iroquois, and in the same year the oldest church in America, the Tadoussac Indian chapel, was erected. On the site of the first church a tiny chapel still stands and the bell, which three centuries ago called the converted Indians to mass, still rings out from the chapel belfry.

In 1661, the Iroquois sacked the village, leaving standing only the church, which their superstition prompted them to leave unmolested and for a time Tadoussac was a deserted village.

In the meantime, explorers had pressed onward and in the search for new worlds this beauty spot on the lower river was neglected. Great cities sprang up throughout the Dominion and Tadoussac remained a tiny village important today only for its historical interest and its summer resort fame. Once the scene of great historical events, peaceful and warlike, Tadoussac today submits each summer to a peaceful invasion as visitors arrive by steamer and by car to rest and play in this oldest settlement on the continent.

Species of Hawks That Are Friends of Farmer

The saying, "the only good hawk is a dead hawk," has been proven false by modern biological studies. Some hawks, of course, prey at times on poultry and valuable game birds. Many, however, live mainly on rodents, insects, and other destructive forms of wild life.

It is not easy to distinguish between the harmful and harmless species of hawks, that in itself being good reason for erring, if at all, on the side of protection. In general, say biologists of the United States Department of Agriculture, harmless hawks have broad wings and wide, fan-shaped tails, and the harmful ones have relatively long tails and rounded wings. Study of the appearance and habits of the hawks in any section should enable farmers and sportsmen to tell which are likely to visit the chicken yard and which will confine themselves largely to feeding on injurious animals, and thus be useful

Woman's Chief Charms Not to Be Purchased

The mouth is a photograph of the disposition. Someone has said that we are not responsible for the disposition we are born with, but we are responsible for the one that we die with. It is the same with the mouth. The sweetness and kissableness and dearness of a baby's mouth are not dependent on the shape or size. Baby's mouth is sweet because his soul is sweet. No brand of lipstick, nor any artist in its use, can camouflage a sour mouth and make even a casual observer believe it is sweet.

Then there is the eye, which the contents of the vanity case cannot change. "The eye is the window of the soul." You can buy something that will lengthen the fringe on the curtains to your soul-windows, you can change the cut of the lambrequins above, but you can't keep people from looking in sometimes, unless you pull the shades down altogether and put yourself in darkness. No vanity case, not even a whole drug store or beauty shop, can make attractive the windows out of which looks a quarrelsome, envious soul.

Keep sweet within, if you want to get full value from your vanity case.—Nellie S. Russell in the Farm Journal.

Gov. Ross Sterling tells this one with a chuckle:

"I had been visiting the Imperial prison farm, near Houston. They furnished me with a car and an efficient driver to return to Houston.

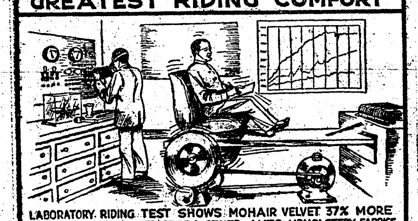
"Certainly, sir."

"You will have enough time?"

"Oh, yes, sir, I have seven years."

FINDS MOHAIR PROVIDES GREATEST RIDING COMFORT



LABORATORY RIDING TEST SHOWS MOHAIR VELVET 37% MORE COMFORTABLE THAN AVERAGE OF 4 OTHER AUTO UPHOLSTERY FABRICS

TRACE CAUSES OF MOTOR FATIGUE

Car Upholstery Bears Decided Relation to Comfort, Riding Enjoyment.

Coming back from a holiday to get rested up is a frequent occurrence, and one not always due to an excessive round of gaiety and "gadding about." In the case of motoring, the most popular and healthful form of holiday-making in America, good reason often exists for coming back more weary than one started out. Complete and utter relaxation are essential for perfect enjoyment of motoring and these are often destroyed, not by a mental worry that one has left the water running in the bathroom, or forgotten to stop milk deliveries, but because the car itself is physically uncomfortable.

That the upholstery of a car plays a large part in the comfort factor was determined recently in a unique test made by an impartial investigator under the most scientific conditions that could be established.

Six different types of fabrics used in automobile upholstery were selected for testing. Then a subject was placed upon an automobile seat which was covered in turn with each of the six fabrics. The chair was set in vibration to duplicate actual riding, exactly uniform conditions of temperature, humidity and clothing were established, and the test was on. The degree of discomfort which the "rider" experienced from sitting on each type of fabric was computed in terms of the amount of body moisture resulting.

The most comfortable materials were found to be pile fabrics, especially mohair velvet which registered the lowest degree of bodily discomfort. The reasons for this are not hard to discover. Each little hair standing on end—and there are as many as forty thousand of them to the square inch of velmo or mohair velvet—acts as a spring which absorbs the shocks. Then, too, less friction is generated between the seat and the clothing, which means easier riding as well as less shine upon the wearing apparel. Also the mohair pile fabric was found to be air-filled and to absorb body moisture more readily than any of the other fabrics, all of which makes for easier riding.

Such a test cannot of itself be absolutely conclusive due to the many physical factors entering in, but the results obtained would seem to be supported by the fact that well over a hundred million yards of mohair velvet are now on the road in automobiles, representing fully a third of the passenger cars in the country.

VEGETARIAN MEALS

CANNED PEAS

THE expression "cabbages and kings" usually signifies a wide scope of subjects, ranging from the lowly to the great. If you lived in France and were addressed as "mon chou" (my cabbage), you would have no reason to feel insulted, whereas, in America, we look upon the cabbage as a lowly thing and a person dubbed a cabbage-head as even lowlier, in French "mon chou" is a term of endearment.

Perhaps the reason lies in the fact that to the French person, every vegetable—even those of the most humble origin—take high rank among foods. Americans, however, are more and more coming to this opinion. Hence the growing popularity of the vegetable dinner, or the vegetable plate as the main course of a dinner. One proof of its increasing importance is the fact that most dinner services now include compartment plates especially designed to hold invitingly a variety of vegetables.

Choosing Harmonious Vegetables

And what a glowing, tempting assortment such a vegetable plate presents if the vegetables are chosen from the angle of the artist and epicure! The first requisite of a well-composed vegetable dinner is that it displays an attractive variety of color and form, since foods must please the eye before they pass palate inspection. Secondly, they must satisfy the taste; and thirdly, they must afford pleasing and healthful after-effects.

Does this sound complex? It is most simple indeed. Let us look first at color. For green, we have at our bidding spinach, string beans, lima beans, Brussels sprouts, okra, green peppers, turnip greens and scores of other greens. Red is a vivid color contrast to green, and it is plentifully afforded in tomatoes, beets, kidney beans, pimiento and other delicious vegetables.

In every color assortment there will perhaps be some light color vegetables, and here you may select from celery, corn, asparagus, wax beans, hominy, sauerkraut or cabbage. And with these paler vegetables the pleasant glow of carrots, sweet potatoes, yellow turnips, or the warm brown of baked beans or mushrooms will be a welcome contrast.

Color, Texture and Shape

Canned vegetables are, of course, always plentifully used in the vegetarian dinner, and their colors are quite as inviting as those of the fresh vegetables since the canner now packs vegetables in the popular sanitary enamel-lined can which serve to preserve perfectly their natural colors.

Texture is as important as color in the choice of vegetables in combination. For instance, the perfect vegetable plate will include some of the soft vegetables, such as peas, asparagus or tomatoes; some of the more chewy ones, such as string beans, spinach, carrots, corn and so forth; and at least one of the crisp or leafy vegetables such as celery, endive or lettuce.

Also, there are myriads of ways of cooking vegetables and fascinating shapes into which they may be cut; so be sure that you do not serve all of your vegetables creamed or all of them mashed. If you favor fluffy mashed potatoes—and they are hard to beat!—be sure to see also that your carrots are cut in long thin slivers and simmered golden brown in butter, that your tomatoes are baked a jolly deep red, and that your string beans are scalloped in cream. There is a great variety of ways to season vegetables to make them pleasingly different.

"Dinner Is Served"

Suppose we plan to serve a dinner that will be varied, colorful, and dietetically correct, and we feature as its main course an attractive vegetable plate. The introduction may be either a soup—jellied, creamed or clear—or a gay decorative canapé. Fish, egg or cheese are excellent choices for canapés, and a tiny cheese rarebit served on circles of sautéed toast with a dash of paprika is a perfect pièce de résistance.

For the main dish, or vegetable plate, a harmonious trio would be pea croquettes, beets stuffed with peas and lima beans, and sautéed corn and pimiento. With this sort of dinner it is not necessary to serve a salad, but dessert may add greatly to the meal. It may be a fairly substantial dessert, and it will be especially welcome if it includes the sweet and fruit quota of the meal. Among the most popular desserts for vegetarian meals are berry shortcake, made from either canned or fresh berries, fruit cobbler with nutmeg sauce, or flaky fruit pie, topped with a generous serving of whipped cream.*

World Milk Record Held By Minn. Cow

Breckenridge, Minn. — Lady Pride Pontiac Lieuwkje, a Holstein queen owned by F. E. Murphy, publisher of the Minneapolis Tribune, has not even heard of the depression.

This cow has just broken the world's record for combined milk and butter production by yielding 35,626 pounds of milk and 1,483 pound of butter in the past 365 day.

The record was made at Femco Farms, near Breckenridge, under the supervision of the Minnesota College of Agriculture and is certified by the Holstein Friesian Association of America.

The average daily production of Lady Pride was 97 pounds of milk, or approximately 50 quarts. The significance of this record is apparent when compared with the average dairy cow production in the United States—about 4,000 pounds of milk. This cow, therefore, produced as much milk in one year as nine average cows.

This animal produced enough rich milk to furnish a pint a day to one hundred children. Her record makes her the highest living butter producer in the world.

In making this production record Lady Pride consumed enough fodder of various kinds to make the expression "an appetite like a horse" seem feeble. Her daily menu is as follows: 26 pounds of grain, 85 pounds of corn silage, 18 pounds of alfalfa hay, 15 pounds of dry beet pulp, and from 220 to 225 pounds or 25 gallons of water. She produces more pounds of milk daily than the solids she eats, 97 pounds as compared with 94. She is a large cow, weighing nearly 1900 pounds.

Breeding authorities point to this cow as a triumph of scientific breeding. Her pedigree is a concentration of famous sires and high producing cows. She is also the dam of two daughters, who, breeding authorities believe, may surpass their aristocratic mother.

Her record having been made, Lady Pride is now being given a vacation. High production cows on test are kept in their stalls all day, spending most of their time eating to produce milk that is taken from them four times daily. Now Lady Pride can lie under a tree, peacefully chew her cud, and gossip with the other ladies of rank on Femco Farms with nothing much to do until the big state fairs start.

Then life will again become a matter of private express cars, grooms and bovine manicurists, and jostling, noisy crowds anxious to see a real lacteal champion.

It will be an outdoor meeting and the speakers, all of whom are nominees for congress on the Farmer-Labor ticket, will have a message worth hearing.

They will be in Middle River the same day at 10 a. m.

Bovina Test Made Legal

The Minnesota bovine tuberculin test act as amended by the 1931 legislature, was held constitutional recently by the state supreme court. The decision was made in a case brought from Pine county, in which the county board of commissioners refused to make an appropriation for a cattle test although petitioned to do so by a majority of cattle owners in that county.

Hail and Wind Storm Does Heavy Damage in Mud Lake Territory

A big hail storm which started west of Strathcona on Wednesday afternoon, traveled down towards Middle River and swung southeast, coming through the Mud Lake territory and ending near Grygla.

The hail, which was accompanied by a very strong wind, did several thousand dollars' worth of damage to crops and buildings. It destroyed the big barn on the old Mike Leiran farm, which is occupied by Claude Simmons, and killed a hundred and seventy-five turkeys for Mrs. Sannes and sons, who live on a farm just south of Simmons.

Buildings on the Bernard Larson farm were blown down and a big shed near the Wilson school was destroyed. Farmers east of Mud Lake report their crops as a total loss and none of them were carrying any hail or windstorm insurance.

In the vicinity of Strathcona the forest was stripped of all foliage and look bleak and barren, as all crops were cut clean near the ground.

What Our Solons Did For Agriculture

Compilations prepared by the American Farm Bureau Federation indicate that Minnesota's senators and representatives have been fair to agriculture and in the main have voted in accord with the needs of farmers, says the Minnesota Farm Bureau. Averages taken from the vote sheet give Congressman Conrad G. Selvig a perfect record, when his ballots are checked with the recommendations of the American Farm Bureau. On the other hand, Congressman Harold Knutson stood at the foot of the list with a record less than half way in accord with the recommendation of organized agriculture. Congressman W. A. Pittenger of Duluth did but slightly better, with five votes in accord with the wishes of organized agriculture and three against.

Senator Thomas D. Schall voted eight times with agriculture and twice against; Senator Henrik Shipstead, six for and twice against. Three Minnesota congressmen had records but slightly less favorable than that of Congressman Selvig, casting seven ballots in accord with the A. F. B. F. recommendations and but one against. They are Congressmen August H. Andresen, Victor Christgau, and Paul J. Kvale.

First Wheat of Season

The first load of new wheat reported sold in this part of the state this season was delivered to the Russell-Miller Milling Co. at Grand Forks on Tuesday by M. J. Bolstad, farmer living 5 miles northeast of East Grand Forks.

W. J. Porter, grain buyer for the elevator, reported the wheat graded No. 1 dark northern and weighed 59 pounds to the bushel. The grain was Marquis, and Mr. Bolstad said it was running 15 bushels per acre.

The Northern Light celebrated its first birthday.

As a sequel to the dead dog tragedy (printed last week), Alf Skjevland of Newfolden made a trip over to Holt to view the remains. According to Editor Latta, "Mr. Skjevland was seeing red and talking blue. He got after Les Silbaugh and had the corpse of the dog taken up for examination. Les showed him the grave and they dug up a chunk of something that looked like a moldy pretzel turned inside out, but smelled decidedly like dead dog." So nothing more could be done about it, and thus ended the far-famed "Murder or Suicide" case.

The creamery business for the month of June, 1912, was as follows: Cream received, 40,091 lbs.; butterfat, 10,919 lbs.; butter made, 13,401 lbs.; number of patrons, 114. Butterfat was 26c per lb., and 14 patrons received $40 or more for June, among them being T. O. Dovre, Ole Saxberg, John Knutson, Steinhauer Bros., Ole Lunke, C. E. Smith, G. P. Sorter, and Louis Wegge. J. A. Sorum was secretary, Pete Anderson buttermaker, and Les Silbaugh ass't.

Big Revue Feature of Night Program at Thief River Fair

Ernie Young's Passing Parade of 1932 will be the night show feature at the Pennington County Fair four evenings next week August 3 to 6. The afternoon programs will consist of high class vaudeville acts and harness and running races. The Thief River Fair last year ranked fifth from the top among nearly a hundred fairs in the state last year and is the outstanding fair of northern Minnesota.

Great-Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty Signed

The United States and Canada this morning agreed by treaty to construction of the $800,000,000 St. Lawrence seaway.

In a brief ceremony at the state department, Secretary Stimson signed for this country and Minister Herridge for Canada.

Pending 11 years, the gigantic project calls for development of the St. Lawrence for a 180-mile stretch from Montreal to Lake Ontario—a seven-year task. It will enable ocean-going vessels to travel to the heart of the continent, while at the same time providing up to 2,000,000 horsepower of electrical energy, to be divided by the American and Canadian sections bordering on the waterway.

It is now a binding agreement between the two administrations but yet must be ratified by the legislative bodies of the two countries before going into effect.

A minute or so after ten a. m., Secretary Stimson penned his name, to be followed at once by Mr. Herridge.

Runestone to Be Shown at Thief River Fair

One of the interesting features at the Pennington County Fair which will be held at Thief River Falls four days next week, will be the display of the famous Kensington Runestone. This stone tells in Runic characters the story of a party of Norsemen who journeyed into what is now Minnesota in the year 1362. The story of the stone will be explained on Thursday afternoon by Constant Larson of Alexandria. It will be on exhibition afternoon and evening in the Main Building. The stone has been displayed at the Minnesota State Fair and will be shown at the World's Fair in Chicago.

We have had no rain here for a long time and things are now drying up pretty bad. The potato crop will not amount to so very much unless we get a good heavy rain soon.

Chosen Head of N. W. Postal Workers

Postmaster W. O. Weinch of Bagley, Minn., was elected president of the Northern Minnesota Postal Workers association at the organization's annual picnic and meeting in the East Grand Forks city park Sunday.

Elected at the conclusion of an all-day schedule of entertainment and social activities, the other officials named were J. F. Johnson, Hines postmaster, as secretary, reelected, and Albert Worth, assistant postmaster at Bemidji, treasurer.

Between 600 and 700 postal employes from throughout northern Minnesota attended the picnic. The program opened with games and competitive sports in the morning and continued with a picnic lunch at noon and a musical and speaking program in the afternoon.

Many Delinquent Auto Taxes

Approximately 200 names are included on the list of delinquent automobile tax payers in Marshall county, certified with A. E. Swandby, clerk of district court, by Mike Holm, secretary of state. The list will be given to Sheriff John P. Berdewich for investigation and collection of all delinquencies possible within the next few days.

Method of Feeding Cows Avoids Late Summer Milk Slump

By Robert Roemer
Larimer County, Colorado

Percentage of high protein meals in the mixture is dropt to balance the higher proteins in prime grass, but hay and grain feeding never stops.

When late summer comes, with lean pastures, flies and heat, the hay and grain yield good dividends. Production holds close to normal. With a fresh cow or two we can even increase total production. How production held up last year is shown by our herd books: May, 49 pounds; June, 58.1; July 58.4; August, 53.7; September, 51.2. All animals were on official test under average conditions without pampering.

SYNOPSIS

Wilson McCann, young Arizona ranchman, is called to help an old friend, Jim Yerby, with a broken leg. Julia Stark, daughter of Matthew Stark, inveterate enemy of the McCanns, is with him. Taking a note from Julia to her father, Wilson is fired on by Jasper, Julia's brother. Ann Gifford, with her young sister, Ethel, are sheep raisers, and on that account unpopular with the cattlemen. "Night riders" shoot a McCann rider. Peter McCann, Wilson's father, offers a reward for the disclosure of their identity. Wilson McCann horsewhips Jasper, he making practically no resistance. Matthew disowns his son for his cowardice, and posts notice he will kill Wilson McCann on sight. Ann Gifford's tragedy is the fate of her dead sister, Nora, betrayed and abandoned by her lover. Jasper Stark and Carl Gitner, known as a "killer," hold secret conferences. A Stark rider, Tom McArdle, is believed by the Starks to have been killed by the McCanns, but rumor links his name with that of Nora Gifford. Matthew Stark is shot and killed, from ambush. Julia finds him dead, with Wilson McCann stooping over him. She and Phil, her younger brother, both accuse McCann of the killing, despite his vehement denial. Wilson is shot from the chapparal, while standing over Matthew Stark's body. Believing him dying, the Starks have him taken to their home.

To the Flying VY man Rafferty put a blunt question: "What d'you want here?"

"I drapped in to see if we couldn't fix things up an' to get the correct facts. I'm hopin' the story we've heard ain't true," Tapscott replied amiably. "We've heard stories and o' course we're not lookin' for trouble, so we figured I'd better come to headquarters an'—

Rafferty ripped out a sudden savage oath. "That lowdown mangy coyote Wils McCann waylaid an' killed Matt Stark this mo'ning, since you're here for facts."

Mildly Tapscott protested. "I don't reckon Wils would waylay anyone, Nick. Who says he waylaid him? I know for a fact that Wils wasn't lookin' for trouble."

Phil's voice broke shrill and high. "Wasn't he? Well, he's found it. You go back an' tell them so that sent you."

"Meanin' he's been hurt?"

"Meanin' he's lying in the house here shot through an' through."

"Tha's bad."

"Bad for the McCanns," retorted Rafferty. "I reckon you ain't worryin' none about Matt."

"Tha's bad, too," Tapscott replied. "I was hopin' we could patch up this range war before it got too late."

"You can't," Phil interrupted, with a touch of hysteria in his boyish voice. "Not till I've got two-three McCanns."

The foreman of the Flying VY ignored this. He had not come to make or receive a declaration of war. "What does Doc Sanders say about Wils?" he asked.

"Gives him a day—or maybe two," Gitner cut in triumphantly, with a raucous laugh.

Tapscott looked through the Texan without apparently seeing him. But the blank hardness of his gaze softened as he turned to Julia. He had an appeal to make and he hoped that she would back it.

"How can I go back an' tell his old dad that? It'll sure break his heart. He sets the world an' all by that boy. What can we do? His old dad is out there in the mesquite waitin' for me to bring him news of his son. What am I to tell him, ma'am?"

Julia's eyes were on a sudden little wells of brimming tears. She thought of her own father and of how he would have felt if she had been dying in the house of an enemy. She hated the McCanns, every last one of them. They had struck at her a mortal blow from which she would never recover. All her life she would cherish revenge. But even so she could not keep a father from the son whose life was ebbing. If she did that she would always despise herself.

"Tell him he can see his boy."

"If he feels like he wants to take the chance," Gitner added with an evil sneer.

For the first time Stone spoke, in the low drawl of the Southland. "If Miss Julia says Pete McCann can come here, why I reckon it'll be all right with you an' me, Carl, won't it?"

Gitner's eyes met his reluctantly. There was something compelling in the cool steady gaze of the little man, something that was a menace if not a threat in the even murmur of the voice. The big Texan said no more.

Julia drew her brother aside and urged upon him impetuously her point of view. He listened, half resentful, half consenting. The youth in him, the milk of his tenderness not yet dried up, appreciated and shared her feeling. But he had to remember his loyalty to the dead father within. Would it be construed as weakness for him to let Peter McCann into the house? Did his honor not rather demand that he shoot the man on sight?

The boy in him was for the moment dominant. "All right. Have it yore own way. I know you will anyhow," Phil said, a little sullenly. "Tell Tapscott to have him come down."

"No, that won't do, Phil. I don't trust that Carl Gitner. We'd better go and meet him, you and I. We'll ride one on each side of him."

To this Phil assented. The three rode up to the pass and Tapscott waved his bandanna as a signal to the McCanns. There was an answering handkerchief, and presently Peter McCann and his son Lyn came out of the brush to meet them.

"Meet Miss Julia, Pete—Mr. McCann, Miss Julia. Her brother, Mr. Phil Stark—Lyn McCann."

Thus Tapscott, as self-elected master of ceremonies, by way of breaking the ice of a cold silence.

None of those named acknowledged the introduction in words or by an inclination of the head. They looked at each other with chill and bitter hatred. But, as the elder McCann looked at Julia, there came a change in his face. Beneath the shaggy brows she caught a glimpse for an instant of his soul. It was there, during the beat of a pulse, and was gone, a look that had amazingly softened the grim countenance. Later she was to puzzle over it and wonder at it.

"Well?" demanded Peter harshly.

"Doc Sanders is lookin' after the boy," Tapscott said.

"How is Wils?"

"Pretty bad, Doc says. Shot through the lung and in the side."

Not a muscle of the old cattleman's face twitched. "Can he be moved?"

"Not a chance. He's—a mighty sick boy, Pete."

"I'll go to him—right now."

Instantly Phil bristled. He would show McCann whether he could ride roughshod in this high-handed way to his end. "I'll have something to say about that. You'll go unarmed if you go."

There was a moment of significant silence while the eyes of the old and the young man clashed.

"Let's get this right," McCann said. "If I go, do I go as a prisoner? Or am I free to leave when I want to?"

Phil's boyish voice lifted to a high note that was almost a wail. "My father's lying dead down there, killed by the son you're going to see. Some day we'll wipe yore whole d—d outfit off the map. But not today. If you go in now you can walk out when you've a mind to."

"How do we know you'll play fair? How do we know some of yore killers won't shoot Dad?" Lyn asked.

"You don't." There was a flare of insolence in young Stark's scornful eyes. "We're not askin' him to come. It's his own say-so. If he's scared why he can stay away."

For the first time Julia spoke, eyes flashing, lips tremulous. "We're not murderers, like you."

"Now folks," interposed Tapscott hurriedly. "This is a mighty bad business all round. One thing's sure. We can't make it any better by that kind of talk. I'm dawggoned sorry myself, Miss Julia, but I'll bet my boots they ain't the way you think they are. I know Wils McCann. You don't. That's the difference. Now I reckon we got this all fixed up. You ride along with these young people, Pete, an' we'll stick around till we hear from you. So-long."

They rode down from the pass in silence, the hearts of all three bitter with anger. But as they came into the valley the Starks fell back till McCann was almost abreast of them. They drew their ponies close to his, so that it would be difficult for anybody to take a shot at him without danger of hitting one of them.

Peter understood the maneuver and smiled sardonically. There was something amusing in this solicitude to protect him. In a day or two this boy and his allies would be laying plans to shoot him at sight.

In close formation they moved to the porch and dismounted. Together they went into the house.

Julia led the way to the room where Wilson McCann lay. After stepping aside to let his father enter she left at once without a word. A Mexican woman was taking care of the sick man under instructions from Doctor Sanders.

McCann moved forward and looked down at the restless figure on the bed. The young man's face was flushed. He was in a high fever and the glazed eyes showed no recognition of his father.

"Is he—so awful bad, Doc?" Peter asked, when he was sure of his voice.

"Mighty sick, McCann," the doctor answered gently. "If he wasn't an Arizona product, tough as cactus rind and clean-blooded as a young antelope, I'd say he hadn't a chance in the world. But he's liable to fool me yet."

"Don't you let him die, Doc," the father begged.

"Not if I can help it. If he lives you can thank Miss Julia. She looked after him fine till I got here."

McCann made no comment on that. "You'll stay right here with him?"

"Till morning anyhow. We'll see how he is then."

"How about sending for a doctor from Los Angeles or El Paso? It's not that I don't trust you, but if he'd have a better chance, why—"

"All right. Wire for Doctor Elder from El Paso. He's a first-rate man."

Peter turned to the nurse and asked her in Spanish to bring Miss Stark.

Julia came. She stood in the doorway, straight as an arrow. Her dark eyes flashed defiantly into the light ones of the cattleman. She waited for him to speak, not asking what he wanted. And again, for an instant, she saw in his face the expression that had puzzled her before. She knew him to be hard and fierce as the Painted desert. What was back of this look in his eyes, almost wistful and yearning, that broke through the cold mask? If it had not been for her father's body lying in the next room it would have disarmed her, for it undermined her prejudices. She did not want to believe it, but she knew that there was a side of him human and probably likable.

"Miss Stark, I want to send to El Paso for another doctor, an' I want to stay here all night with my boy," he said.

It was on her tongue tip to tell him that he could not possibly stay, that neither she nor her brother would consider it. But her eyes were drawn past him to the stricken figure on the bed. Something in her that was deeper than hate, than the demand in her for revenge, stirred within her heart. She resented it bitterly, but she could not refuse.

"If you'll give me the message to your son I'll take it myself," she said.

Doctor Sanders wrote the telegram so that there might be no mistake in verbal transmission.

Julia took it and walked out of the room without another look at either of the McCanns. Her pony was still saddled in front of the house. She rode out of the valley toward the pass, her body shaken with anguished sobs. Never before today had life seemed to her so empty and so futile.

A sound startled her. She turned, to see Stone riding just behind.

"Thought maybe I'd better drift along," he drawled. "You never can sometimes tell."

She choked down a sob and nodded thanks.

"I don't reckon I could help you any way?" he suggested gently.

"No, it's—just the way things are. We have to let those McCanns stay here after—after what they did—"

The little Texan studied her a moment before he spoke. "It ain't been proved, Miss Julia, that Wils McCann did it."

"If he didn't, who did?"

"I'm not offerin' any opinion on that."

"Then why do you say maybe he didn't?"

His stony eyes were opaque. "Only a notion of mine."

"Oh well! If he didn't do it he knows who did. It's all the same. They were lying in wait for Dad—he and his friends. What's it matter who fired the shot?"

Stone looked at her, strangely, she thought, and looked away. "Maybe so."

CHAPTER VI

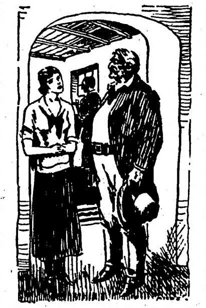
Friendship Rejected

After Julia had delivered McCann's message to his son she returned with Stone to the ranch. The Texan left her there and jogged down the valley along the road which Matthew Stark had followed a few hours earlier.

Out of the brush a man rode to meet Stone.

"'Lo, Sam," the Texan said. "I asked you to be here because I want you to show me just where the old man was standin' when he was shot."



Her Dark Eyes Flashed Defiantly Into the Light Ones of the Cattleman.

"Sure," agreed Sharp. Five minutes later he was showing Stone where they picked up the body of his employer.

"Here's where he lay—an' Wils McCann was right over there. Miss Julia, she was lookin' after Wils. Say, I'm right sorry for that li'l girl. She must be a sure enough Christian, her hatin' that McCann like she does an' having to save his life after he'd shot her paw."

"If he shot Stark," the Texan amended. "Looks to me like McCann heard the shot an' went to see who'd been hurt."

"Some one shot the old man. It don't look like if some of the rest of the McCann outfit did it they'd go away an' leave Wils wounded without lookin' after him."

"That's a bull's eye shot, Sam. They wouldn't. So we know Wils was alone."

"I reckon."

"Another point. Who shot Wils? Matt Stark didn't. Phil didn't. Miss Julia didn't. You hadn't got here, so, you didn't."

Sam scratched his head. If this was a riddle he did not know the answer. "Blamed if I know. Who did?"

"I don't claim to know—yet. But I'll say one thing. It ain't proved to my satisfaction that the same man didn't shoot both the old man an' Wils McCann."

"Now looky here, Dave. I ain't talkin' about the fellow who shot McCann. But take the old man. He gives it out in cold type that he aims to kill Wils McCann on sight. All right. He hears Wils is fixin' up this head gate an' he lights out hell-for-leather to get him. We all figure there's liable to be trouble between them an' we get busy to head it off. But we're too late. When we get here the old man's dead an' Wils McCann is standin' over him with a rifle in his hands."

"An open-an'-shut case, a fellow would say first off," the little Texan agreed with a smile. "But look at the other side. McCann's rifle was full up with shells. Not one gone. Are you askin' me to believe that he was packin' one extra shell in his pocket an' that he waited to put it in the magazine after he had shot Stark before comin' into the open? It don't look hardly likely, does it? This Wils McCann. I size him up a fighter but a game one. If he killed Stark it was in the open, an' I don't reckon the old man was give a chance for his white alley. He was plugged when he wasn't expecting it."

"We don't even know that. Maybe they met right here an' Wils beat him to it."

"No. He was shot from that ditch likely."

"Why from the ditch an' not from the brush?"

Stone showed his companion a clump of prickly pear standing on a sand hillock. Through two of the thick leaves a neat small hole had been bored.

"Here's where the bullet went after it passed through Matt's head."

"Great snakes! I'll bet you're right." The wrangler's forehead wrinkled in thought. "An' if it did the fellow must a-been lying in the ditch over there or mighty close to it."

They walked over to the irrigation ditch.

"Water runnin' in it," commented Stone. "D'you happen to notice whether there was any in it when you drove across with the buckboard?"

"Nary a drop. The ditch was dry as that wash there."

"Funny. Who opened the lateral headgate, do you reckon? An' why? Here's the point, Sam, an' it sticks out like a sore thumb. The slit-eyed son-of-a-gun that shot the old man left a heap of tracks here in the soft sand at the bottom of the ditch an' in the clay just above. He had to light a shuck real sudden when Phil an' Miss Julia drapped in on him onexpected. But he was a heap worried about them footprints. So he beats it back later an' turns the water into the ditch so nobody can cut sign on him."

"You figure maybe the McCanns—"

"Did I mention the McCanns?" the little Texan asked in a soft drawl.

He went over the sandy soil and studied it almost in microscopic detail. He spent nearly an hour at this before he remounted and rode away.

Jasper Stark appeared at the Circle Cross toward evening. He swaggered into the house with the manner of a master.

Julia met him and drew him into the big room that served as the family gathering place.

"Oh Jas," she wailed. "Isn't it awful?"

"I just heard," he told her. "Been roundin' up cattle all day to sell. Fellow told me when I got back to Mesa. I came right out."

Her memories flashed back to what her younger brother had said. "Phil thought he saw you near the Three Cottonwood. Were you up that way?"

He swept her face with a look of quick and sullen suspicion. "No, I wasn't. Nowhere near there. Why?"

"That's where Dad was killed. Some one shot Wils McCann there afterward. We thought maybe—"

"Well, you thought wrong," he interrupted harshly. "But I hope whoever shot him did a good job."

"He's alive, but awf'ly badly hurt. He was shot through the lung and the side. Doctor Sanders thinks he hasn't much chance."

"Bully! Where is he at?"

"He's here."

"Here! Whacha mean?"

"I mean he's here in the house, too sick to move."

"Who brought him here?"

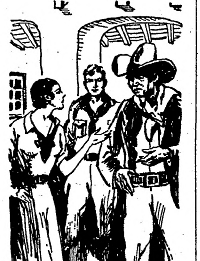
"I did."

He exploded in a roar of rage.

When for a moment he ceased to bellow Julia mentioned more information that added fuel to his fury. "His father's here looking after him."

"Pete McCann!"

"Yes. And there's no use shouting, Jas. Dad's lying in the next room, you know." She spoke quietly, looking straight at him.



Jasper's Face Had Turned a Sickly Yellow. "Cut Me Out of It, Did He?"

He stamped up and down shaking his big fist. It was not till he came to a specific threat that she interrupted.

"No, you won't, Jas. You'll not touch him. I told him he might come and stay."

"You told him. Goddlemighty, what you got to do with it? Claim you're boss here now, do you? I'll show you about that."

Phil had come into the room and was standing beside his sister. "Gettin' down to cases, just what d'you mean, Jas?" he asked.

"Mean? Why, ain't I the oldest son? Ain't I runnin' the Circle Cross now? You can bet your boots I am. I'm boss here now an' don't you forget it."

"Are you?" The eyes of the boy consulted those of his sister before he fired his bomb. "I reckon you're mistaken, Jas. Mr. Fletcher sent his black boy Tom out here last night with Dad's will. Right here in this room Dad signed it before witnesses. Jule an' I tried to get him to put it off, but he wouldn't listen to a word."

Jasper's face had turned a sickly yellow. "Cut me out of it, did he?"

"Yes." The boy did not add that Matthew Stark had said publicly to those present that Jasper was no son of his.

The older son was beside himself with disappointment, ready for any display of bad temper and malice.

"Don't get on the hook," his brother advised. "Say you act mean an' vicious. What good 'll it do you? Soon as the will gets into court you'll be kicked out, anyhow."

Jasper choked down his passion. What Phil said was true. He had no case for a fight in court. His only chance was that the other two children of Matthew Stark would reverse the action of their father. Sullenly he back-tracked.

How Should One Banish Tyranny of Insomnia?

Since an Australian scientist has discovered the sleep control center of the brain, may we ask if it were like a push button? This is the utility of the discovery most desired. We resent, and bitterly, the power of insomnia to work its will with us. It is a tyrant that is indifferent to our railings.

Physiology and psychology seem closely related in the human quality of sleep. It is a comfortable doctrine that if your unconscious repose is quite regularly but five hours out of the twenty-four, that that is all "your system requires"; but there is the lassitude, depression and exhaustion of the long day, to refute any such conclusion.

Sleep, that knits up the raveled sleeve of care, must somehow be made to tend to its knitting, F. H. Collier, writing in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, concludes. Probably the victim knows ways to enforce this, but they are inconvenient and often impossible. Run ten miles and you will sleep ten hours. No doubt; but when and where can one run ten miles without being taken for a lunatic? And one's hours must be occupied in making a living.

American Military Genius

It is curious to observe, since the war of 1914-1918, the enormous and ever-growing prestige of the American generals of our Civil war. If we may judge by expert foreign military opinion, five Americans in one local war—Lee, Jackson, Grant, Sherman, Sheridan—stand higher in military annals than any general from any country in the war between nations. I know nothing about this myself; I am merely recording the opinions of experts.—William Lyon Phelps in Scribner's Magazine.

Standard Words

According to a definition given by Doctor Vizetelly, a standard English word is one that has been used by a master of classic English—one of the great authors of the day or of days gone by—that is accepted as good English by educated writers and speakers of our time. Foreign terms that are not naturalized, such as words derived from the French, German, Dutch, Spanish, Italian, Russian, etc., and printed in dictionaries, preceded by (Fr.), (Ger.), (D.), (Sp.), etc., are not standard English words; nor are dialect, provincial, Scottish, colloquial, slang or vulgar words considered so. The standard English of today is English used by present-day writers and speakers who are competent to set the standard. It is necessarily English acceptable in polite society.

Japanese Religion

It is impossible to give the precise origin of the Shinto religion of Japan. This is a mild form of ancestor worship and lists 14,000 gods and has 13 sects. It appears to have been the native religion of the early Japanese.

Current Wit and Humor

IN THEORY

Husband and wife were seated in the garden in the dusk of a summer evening. He was doing most of the talking.

"Very interesting," she said, when he finally concluded.

"I'm glad to find you're so interested and impressed, dear, by these explanations about banking and economics," he told her presently.

"Yes, darling," she replied. "It seems wonderful that anybody could know as much as you do about money without having any of it."

"Yes, but, my dear wife, dressmakers aren't the only ones out of work."

HEMP'S LARGE PART IN HUMAN HISTORY

Has Well-Merited Title of King of Fibers.

Hemp flashed into the pages of history more than 5,000 years ago, and for centuries was the king of fibers. Today, cheaper fibers are competing with hemp in the cordage factory.

Hemp sails dropped out of sight with the manufacture of cotton sails and the development of marine engines; hemp rope met a bitter rival that unseated it when mariners discovered that abaca fiber, which is called Manila "hemp," was cheaper, would float, and did not require the application of tar; hemp cotton-bale wrapping bowed to Indian jute and waste cotton; and 20 years ago carpet manufacturers substituted cotton and jute warping for hemp.

Hemp is a cousin of the mulberry tree, and a native of Asia. Since 2800 B. C., when a Chinese emperor taught his subjects to cultivate hemp and to make hemp cloth for clothing, hemp has frequently appeared in historic records. The Chinese also ate the seeds and extracted an oil from the plant.

Hemp followed civilization westward. Before the Christian era the Indians, Arabian and Persians were cultivating hemp for drugs, which they learned to extract from the plant. The Scythians took hemp with them to Europe 3,500 years ago. Hemp's drugs attracted North Africans to the plant and the strength of its fiber—hemp is the strongest of all fibers—brought it into wide use on the sailing vessels of the Mediterranean.

Hemp invaded the Western hemisphere in 1545 when some seeds from Spain reached Chile. North America began to cultivate hemp shortly after the Puritans settled in Massachusetts, but the southern colonies were more successful with their plantations. Laws promoting the hemp industry were passed by the early legislatures of colonial Virginia. Lancaster, Penn., was the center of a large hemp-producing region during the Revolution.

Few "Aces" Among Men of Medicine

I hold no brief for doctors; I believe that I can look at them rather calmly. And I can say this: that on the whole they are an honest, competent and resourceful set of men at their trades, and that most of the difficulty comes from expecting too much of them.

It is preposterous to think that 150,000 men more or less selected at random should be scientists and artists. They are not. The average doctor is a trailer, a camp follower, a nonentity, who contributes nothing to medical science but merely tries, according to his lights and opportunities, to apply what other men have found out.

This latter work is done by a numerically negligible percentage of the profession; indeed many of them are not even in the profession. Pasteur was not a doctor at all. Is the average telephone lineman a Steinmetz, or the average power house attendant an Edison?

The outlook of the average ordinary doctor is no more akin to that of Dr. William Welch or William Osler or William Halsted—scientifically, ethically, spiritually—than the physical outlook of a lowly catfish paddling around in a mudhole is akin to that of a bald eagle soaring in the empyrean. Personally, I'm one of the catfish, and I can testify that the hole is crowded.—An Anonymous Physician in the Forum and Century.

Fisherman's "Luck"

J. K. Lowndes, Chicago fly fisherman, had a catch which he boasts is the most original ever made by a fisherman. In the process of making a cast, he flipped his line straight behind him. The line caught a mangy and much irritated black bear, the fly catching in the bear's left ear. Returning to the spot an hour later, Mr. Lowndes found the bear gone and his rod broken, but he had a thumb nail patch of bearskin as proof of his prowess.

New York Chamber of Commerce First Founded

The earliest American chamber of commerce was the New York Chamber of Commerce, founded in 1768, says Pathfinder Magazine. In the United States chambers of commerce are private and have no direct connections with the national, state or local government. The United States Chamber of Commerce is a super chamber of commerce, that is, it is a federation of local chambers of commerce, boards of trade, national trade associations and similar bodies. Its chief functions are to coordinate and express the views of its member bodies, supply trade information and generally to serve the commercial interests of the nation as the local units serve their communities. "The Nation's Business" is the official magazine published by the United States Chamber of Commerce. Although the national organization was formed in 1912 at a conference called in Washington by President Taft, it is in no sense a government organization.

She Reduced 38 Pounds The Safe Way

"I have been taking Kruschen Salts for 4 months and I think they are wonderful. I am 32 years old and 5 ft. 2 in. tall. I was very fat. I weighed 165 lbs. and now I weigh 127 lbs. and feel fine. If I let up taking the Salts one morning I feel lazy and heavy," Mrs. Florence Loftus, Boston.

This is just one of hundreds of letters we get every month—Kruschen not only causes you to lose fat but while you are losing it you gain in health—in vivaciousness—you lose fat where fat is most prominent and at the same time keep stomach, liver, kidneys and bowels functioning naturally.

Any drugstore in the world will sell you a jar of Kruschen for a trifling sum—take one-half teaspoonful in a glass of hot water every morning—go light on fatty meats, potatoes and sweets. But for your health's sake demand and get Kruschen Salts—imitations are numerous. It's the little daily dose that does it.

Anyway, a swelled head makes one happy.

Mercolized Wax Keeps Skin Young

Get an ounce and use as directed. Fine particles of aged skin peel off until all defects such as pimples, liver spots, tan and freckles disappear. Skin is then soft and velvety. Your face looks years younger. Mercolized Wax brings out the hidden beauty of your skin. To remove wrinkles use one ounce Powdered Saxolite dissolved in one-half pint witch hazel. At drug stores.

IMPORTANCE OF BEING IMPORTANT

Matter of Moment, as You Look at It.

"The importance of being important is, it seems to me, too disturbingly impressive to the people who would like to be, or, at any rate, seem to be, important," said Mr. Cato Ninetails. "If course, there are people who are undoubtedly important, but it is not so much the result of their special efforts to be important as of a combination of circumstances and their individual talents. That is to say, they are not important merely because they want to be important, but because of the natural order of things. There are other people who are not important, but who seem to be important. I don't know whether this is merely the result of chance or is brought about by good management. Which ever it is, it seems to require no great effort by them, and they undoubtedly fool a great many people. Sometimes I suspect that they even fool themselves. There are still others of high ambition—or perhaps strong egotism—who notwithstanding their vast expenditure of effort, thought and imagination, are unable to make themselves seem important; and their persistence is a trial to their own nerves, and an irritation or, even worse, a bore to their acquaintances.

"Now, is seems to me that being important must be rather burdensome, and seeming to be important is even more so. On him who is important many things are loaded that, by rights, should be carried by other people, but with his peculiar talents I doubt that he finds oppressive a load that would crush most of the rest of us. Importance is his job in the world, and he is built to endure it. It is not likely that the burden of imitation importance—that is, that carried by the people who seem important—is nearly so heavy; added to the workaday pack of him who is important it is probable that it would hardly be noticed; but for the carriers it is sometimes so great that close observation shows that now and then they stagger under it for all their knack of maintaining misleading appearances. Theirs is a hard life, but they like it because so many people think that they are important.

"My sympathy goes out to those who want to seem important, and can't. They strive so hard, and achieve so little. Nor do they ask much, for while they would undoubtedly like to be important, they would be fairly well content if they could just manage to seem important. Life with them must be a succession of disappointments, of trial and error, with error predominating. It seems to me that somebody whose oral flow and command of expression were equal to it should explain to them that they do not know when they are well off, for not being important is one of the easiest—if not the easiest—of life's assignments. He who is important pays for it with hard work, however equal to the task he may be; he who seems to be important pays for it with worry, whatever the degree of tranquility he may present to the world; he who fails in his efforts to seem important must find a bitter tang in all life's savors; on the other hand, he who is willing to leave the job of being important, or seeming important, to others is relieved of many of life's most arduous requirements. His responsibilities are light and his obligations are lighter, for he does not, like the people who are important or who seem important, have to be all things to all men. It is his privilege to get out of the hurly burly for a contemplative period now and then, and thank his lucky stars that he has no aspirations that interfere with a quiet and comfortable life.

"'What things do you regard as important nowadays?' I asked Buck.

"'How would I know?' he responded.

"'Why shouldn't you know?'

"'Only the historians of century hence will be able to tell what was important nowadays.'"—Indianapolis News.

Old Custom Retained

The letters "L. S." on legal documents are the abbreviation of Latin "locus sigilli," meaning place for the seal. The Romans used to take off their signet rings and imprint their seals on all documents, and the present legal practice is a survival of that custom.

Slapped by "Her Majesty"

At the age of eighty-six a scientist and electrician won a fresh reputation by delivering one of the wittiest and most entertaining after-dinner speeches ever heard in the Savoy hotel, London, writes Henri Pickard in the Cincinnati Enquirer. This pioneer octogenarian was Col. C. E. Crompton, the Faraday medallist of 1922, who was accorded a complimentary dinner by admirers, friends and colleagues.

In a voice that could easily be heard throughout the large hall, Colonel Crompton acknowledged the compliments paid him by telling some amusing stories of his early scientific days.

"I am about the only person who has ever been slapped by such a model of dignity as Queen Victoria," he declared. "That happened in '81 or '82, when I introduced into Windsor castle the type of lighting which you see in this room today. Of course, it is common now, but at that time it was a novelty.

"Her majesty said she had never seen anything like it before and promptly slapped my face.

"But when other people admired the light she was very fair about it. When someone wanted to introduce me later Queen Victoria waved him aside with the remark: 'This young man had the cheek to have his own way, and his own way happened to be right.'"

Letchworth Park

THAT section in particular of the beautiful valley of the Genesee river which surrounds the gorge of the upper, middle and lower falls long has been famous in the annals of the geology, the romance and the scenic attractiveness of the Empire state.

The hunting and camping grounds of the Seneca Indians in early days, it became the country estate of William Pryor Letchworth, a Buffalo business genius, in 1859, who purchased 1,000 acres and constructed thereupon a charming Colonial residence which he christened Glen Iris, set out 10,000 trees and created one of America's most magnificent estates. 'Tis said that every tree save one that will grow in this climate is here represented.

The splash of the 107-foot-high middle fall of the Genesee in its high-walled, rocky canyon is audible from the portico of Glen Iris, the incoming driveway circles a broad-spreading seventy-five-year-old elm, an Indian council house of early New York state tribes and other relics are nearby. Within the park there is a monument which marks the grave of Mary Jemison, a white woman captive who married an Indian and became known as "The White Woman of the Genesee."

One of Mr. Letchworth's great delights, I am told, was to see other less fortunate souls enjoy picnicking on his reservation. Accordingly, when he died, he left the domain to the state, which has wisely preserved it—for the enjoyment and education of the people.

For quiet charm, Letchworth probably is unsurpassed by any other public preserve in our eastern states.

Praise Became Reproach

The word "Hun" was a term of reproach given to the Germans by their enemies from the beginning of the World war. It seems to have first been associated by William II with his army as a term of praise. He used it in an address to his troops about to sail for China from Bremerhaven, July 27, 1900. For many years the German Socialists used the word "Hun" in attacking the militarists in that country.

Gold Strike Made in Western Ontario

News reached here this week of the discovery of a rich gold property in the Atikwa lake section to the east of Lake of the Woods, by Gus Lindberg, one of Northern Ontario's best known prospectors, say the Baudette Region. Mr. Lindberg states that the vein averges 12 feet in width and has been uncovered for about 1,000 feet in length and traced for over a mile and a half. The values obtained from channel assays across the vein have averaged from $18.00 to $66.80 per ton, and it is generally conceded to be one of the richest surface showings ever uncovered in Northern Ontario.

Backed by eastern mining interest, Gus Lindbergh came here about four years ago bent on trying out new territory. He was pleased with the favorable geology of the section of the country east of Whitefish Bay and concentrated his energies in that area. A hard working prospector, he kept at his task year after year, confident that there was a big find to be made there at some point. It it gratifying, therefore, that success has attended his efforts and one which will likely bring this territory into the mining limelight.

Traffic Census

To get facts as to travel on Minnesota highways, systematic count has been made once each year for the past several years. This is known, a state highway bulletin says as "taking the traffic census", and the information obtained is important in determining present day requirements and indicating probable future ones as to both maintenance and new construction.

Beginning on Monday of this wook, men stationed at 407 points throughout the state have been recording the number of passenger vehicles, large trucks, small trucks, trailers, horse drawn buggies and wagons, big freight vehicles, motor vehicles under Minnesota licenses, under licenses of other states and other countries; as much useful information, in fact, as can be obtained without bringing the traffic to a stop.

The work checking the highway traffic will be continued until midnight Sunday, the checkers working in relays from six A. M. until midnight each day. The checkers on highway 32 thru here are stationed a half mile north of Thief River Falls.

Method of Feeding Cows Avoids Late Summer Milk Slump

By Robert Roemer

Eighty per cent of the cows had been in milk many months when the peak was reached. Cows went off pasture in prime condition for winter. This year we expect similar results, with the peak coming 45 to 60 days later.

With prices for butterfat greatly depressed this method of increasing production may be viewed with suspicion. To question it on that ground is sensible. However, we should increase volume from the better cows only, and decrease total volume by culling out the scrub producers. That would be a long step toward satisfactory dairy profits. (The End)

HOLT, MINNESOTA.

Marshall Wheat Quality Is Good

Wheat threshed in the county is of good quality and is running from ten to twenty bushels to the acre, according to farmers who have cut their grain.

Most of the crops already threshed has been harvested with combines and there is a considerable amount being cut with binders this week. Next week operations will be in full swing all over the county.

It is apparent, according to Oscar Pearson, of Warren, in charge of the campaign against grasshoppers, that the pest will do much damage to late flax and barley fields. The Hessian fly also has cut down the yield to some extent. A few fields of barley have been cut and threshed with yields of from 35 to 40 bushels to the acre reported.

Farmers are expecting to harvest little alfalfa hay from the second cutting. Some has dried too rapidly and much of it is being plowed under. A good crop of potatoes is looked for if we get some more rain soon and, reports from farmers indicate a good yield of corn that will provide a good supply of feed for livestock this winter.

Gas Tax Melon Split

A $2,162,500 melon was split among Minnesota's counties with distribution of one-third of the state's gasoline tax for the first six months.

Hennepin, Ramsey and Saint Louis counties all received the maximum permitted under the distribution law, each cutting a slice totaling $64,875. The minimum paid counties was $16,218. Counties receiving this sum include Mahnomen and Red Lake.

Other counties realized the following sums: Becker, $30,500; Beltrami, $18,150; Clearwater, $21,050; Kittson, $26,000; Lake of the Woods, $23,500; Norman, $28,500; Pennington, $22,000; Polk, $51,100; Roseau, $36,600 and Marshall county $43,250.

Farmer-Labor Leaders Spoke

Former U. S. Senator Magnus Johnson, A. C. Townley, creator of the National Nonpartisan League, Ernest Lundeen, former Congressman from the Fifth Minnesota district, and Henry G. Teigan, editor of the Farmer-Labor Leader, addressed a gathering here Monday morning.

Some of the speakers who are nominees for Congress on the Farmer-Labor ticket delivered messages worth hearing, while a few of them — Townley in particular—used entirely the wrong method of vote-getting by getting up and razzing the public, the banks, the merchants, and everything in general.

You farmers who heard A. C. Townley say that the merchants and banks were getting the best of you are entitled to an explanation. The speaker made no distinction between a big chain bank outfit and a small local independent bank, nor did he draw the line between the chain store and the independent merchant (who may in some cases have more than one store, which we have found out is a good thing, as then he can buy goods in big lots and pass the bargain on to those who trade with him). Do you know that every time a small bank or merchant is frozen out of business you are automatically helping the chain outfits to get a better hold on your community, as you must do business some place regardless of what the times or conditions may be.

Whenever these big blowhorns have the gumption to come right out and tell you who they actually mean when they say "banks and merchants" they may have a chance to convince some of the people to send them to congress.

We are not knocking the Farmer-Labor Party, as they cannot help that some guy who cannot make the grade alone sneaks in during a year like this in the hopes of going over with the party wave. We hope that before you vote for any man, you will study him out as an individual and not let his party-label alone pass him.

We figure that after the November election there will be only the Farmer-Labor and Democratic parties left in this country. The rest will be either sold out or vanished with some big engineering project.

Another Close Shave

Another one of those close shave accidents happened here one day last week when a car from Middle River and Jim Peterson's truck tangled fenders out in the main intersection here The fellow from Middle River was in the wrong, as he swung out to the wrong side and forced Mr. Peterson to hit his car.

To the Public

Notice is hereby given to the people in Holt who are keeping chickens and turkeys and, who lets them roam around at free will, to take care of them at once. There is no reason whatsoever for any one to let their fowls stray around in such a way at this time of the year.

This notice does not mean that you can not keep birds in town but, complaints are coming to us from your neighbors that they will no longer stand for having the birds in their gardens and yards.

The gardens are not yielding any too good as it is this year and, therefore, a flock of birds do not improve the conditions by pecking away at the few vegetables that are trying to survive in the heat and drought.

Kindly give this matter your personal attention at once as we do not care to take action against any one in a case that can be avoided by a little care of your own property and, due respect for what your neighbor has.

SYNOPSIS

Wilson McCann, young Arizona ranchman, is called to help an old friend, Jim Yerby, with a broken leg. Julia Stark, daughter of Matthew Stark, inveterate enemy of the McCanns, is with him. Taking a note from Julia to her father, Wilson is fired on by Jasper, Julia's brother. Ann Gifford, with her young sister, Ethel, are sheep raisers, and on that account unpopular with the cattlemen. "Night riders" shoot a McCann rider. Peter McCann, Wilson's father, offers a reward for the disclosure of their identity. Wilson McCann horsewhips Jasper, he making practically no resistance. Matthew disowns his son for his cowardice, and posts notice he will kill Wilson McCann on sight. Ann Gifford's tragedy is the fate of her dead sister, Nora, betrayed and abandoned by her lover. Jasper Stark and Carl Gitner, known as a "killer," hold secret conferences. A Stark rider, Tom McArdle, is believed by the Starks to have been killed by the McCanns, but rumor links his name with that of Nora Gifford. Matthew Stark is shot and killed, from ambush. Julia finds him dead, with Wilson McCann stooping over him. She and Phil, her younger brother, both accuse McCann of the killing, despite his vehement denial. Wilson is shot from the chapparal, while standing over Matthew Stark's body. Believing him dying, the Starks have him taken to their home. Despite opposition, his father is allowed to see him. Dave Stone, Stark rider, a Texan with a record as a "killer," openly doubts Wilson's guilt. Jasper is disinherited by his father's will.

—7—

"Jule, you an' Phil wouldn't keep me outa my share of the property, would you? That would be a low-down trick, jus' because Dad got sore at me an' hadn't time to forget it."

"Phil and I haven't talked this over. We haven't even thought about it." She broke into sudden passionate protest. "I'd think, Jas, you'd have the decency to forget it till—for a few days anyhow."

"Easy enough for you to talk," he grumbled. "Nobody's done you a meanness like they have me."

"We'll do what's right, Phil and I. But you can't come here and bully us. We don't want the McCanns here any more 'n you do. We hate it—especially—"

She bit her lip to keep back a sob. Both the men knew she was thinking of her father.

"Well, then, why not throw 'em out?" Jasper wanted to know.

"Because we're not savages. Because one of 'em is dying—and the other is his father. Can't you see, Jas? It's not what we want to do, but what we've got to do."

"Folks are liable to do a lot of talkin'. I'll say that."

"Then they'll have to talk. We can't help it."

"I don't sabe this business, Jule," he told her, narrowed eyes full in hers. "What's back of it? What game are you playin'?"

A flush swept the girl's cheeks and died away leaving her white and still. She knew what he meant—that this was a covert insinuation of a love affair between her and Wilson McCann. A wave of nausea engulfed her.

"I think you're the most hateful man I ever knew," she flamed, and went out of the room on a crescendo of sobs.

Phil missed the point but knew that his sister thought Jasper had insulted her. He asked a question bluntly.

"What you drivin' at, anyhow?"

"Don't you get sore, too, kid," the older brother answered. "I got eyes, an' I use 'em. She's mighty high-heeled, Jule is. But she can't draw the wool over my eyes. It ain't all Christian kindness that's moving her. Not on yore sweet life. It's that Wils McCann. She's in love with him."

"What!"

"Sure as you're a foot high. There's somethin' doin' between her an' that lobo wolf that killed Dad." Jasper nodded malevolently and triumphantly.

His brother recoiled, hard hit. "I don't believe it."

"You'll see," Jasper promised, wisely.

To those stricken by grief it seems at first that death has dammed the river of life and that its channel must be forever dry. But it is of the fortunate essence of our being that life flows on in spite of us. The very detail of existence so absorbs us that our sorrow is pushed into the background.

Thus it was with Julia in the days after her father's body had been laid to rest. Her time was very fully occupied, for she had inherited the joint management of large interests. Jasper still called the ranch his home apparently, though he was of no use whatever in looking after it. Julia did not understand him at all. It was not only that he considered himself ill-used. There was something on his mind that made him savage and irritable. His idea of justice was that Phil and she should make out a deed to him of one-third the property left by their father and should let him run the ranch according to his fancy without interference.

If he had been at all reasonable Julia would have been tempted to join with Phil in acceding to his demand. But she knew in her heart that if she gave way it would be weakness. In this Phil concurred. He knew, better even than Julia, that Jasper had flung away the reins of all self-control, that he was drinking heavily and spending his time with worse than worthless characters. In Mesa was a Mexican tendejon that had become a sink of iniquity where the scum of humanity gathered. It was known as Pedro's place. Here Jasper went every morning and remained most of the day.

Wilson McCann and his father were still at the Stark ranch. Slowly, inch by inch, the young man was beating back the tide that had almost engulfed him. His strength began to renew itself. He was so nearly out of danger that the question of moving him became imminent. Neither Phil nor Julia ever entered the sick room or exchanged a word with the McCanns.

On an afternoon Julia made a suggestion to Phil that flushed his boyish face with pleasure.

"Let's go see the Gifford girls. We ought to show we feel friendly. Don't you think so? You used to know them, didn't you?"

"Yes, before—before Nora went away. I knew 'em right well. But now nobody's welcome there."

"And Jasper knew them, too, I've heard."

"Yep. Quite a few of the boys went there. Tom McArdle did—an' Gitner—an' I've seen Dave Stone there. They don't any of 'em go any more. Ann won't have 'em. Makes it mighty lonesome for Ethel. She's a mighty nice gal, Jule. If you could make friends with her an' Ann—"

He left his sentence unfinished, but it was expressive enough as it stood.

"I'll try," she promised.

They rode up out of the valley toward Tincup pass. From the distance came faint voices. The foreman of the Circle Cross was making a gather of beeves for the trail. The plaintive bleating of a calf just reached them. Through the pass they moved down to the desert. The girl thought of almost the last time she had crossed it, in the moonlight, beside her the strong sun-browned man who had become anathema to her family. She had talked with Dave Stone. In her heart she knew that Wilson McCann had not killed her father. He had given her his word that he would not wage any but a fair fight. In spite of her resentment against him she believed he would keep his word.

The horses climbed the mesa where the sheep ranch had its headquarters.

A shy-eyed girl came to the door to meet them. At sight of Phil her cheeks flew a flag of color.

The boy swung from the saddle. "Miss Ethel, meet my sister. She'll be right glad to know you."

Ethel Gifford's blue eyes filmed with tears when Julia came forward and impulsively kissed her. She was starved for affection. There was none of it in her life except that which came from Ann, who jealously protected her from any chance of it on the part of others.

"My dear, we're going to be friends," Julia said.

The other girl's lip trembled. "Won't you—come in?" she invited dubiously. Ann was away from home, but the thought of her obtruded. She would not like her asking the Starks into the house.

The visitors followed her into the low-ceilinged room. It was a homelike place, Julia saw in the first swift glance. In the deep windows of the adobe walls were potted flowers, geraniums, begonias, and fuchsias. They were curtained with clean muslin. A piano filled one corner. On the mantel were photographs and a framed print of a Del Sarto madonna.

There was a moment of silence before Ethel explained that her sister was out at one of the camps. "But I expect her back any time," she added.

"I think she must be a pretty good manager," Julia said. "I hear you are doing so well. I am glad."

"If we could only sell out and go away," Ethel wistfully replied. "Perhaps we can when folks find out we're making money here."

"You don't like the desert?" the older girl asked.

"I hate it. It's . . . horrible. It . . . takes us and . . . crushes our lives." She flung out her hands in a gesture of passionate despair. "Folks that are good and kind—they change—and awful things happen."

"Yes," said Julia, struck by a sudden depression of sadness.

Ethel's sweet mouth quivered. "Oh, I'm sorry. I forgot—about you. I was thinking of myself. It gets so terrible sometimes—when I let myself think—"

She broke off. In her eyes was an expression of fear, of some haunting dread too great for endurance.

Phil's heart was very tender to this charming creature, so soft and defenseless. It ached for her now. The generous youth in him was eager to defend her.

But defend her against what? Not grief alone for her sister Nora's death had brought that stricken look into her face. There was something else—something sinister and evil that she felt like a shadow of disaster hovering over her life. What could it be? What had so moved her to futile and protestant outburst? Was it possible that some threat still overhung, one of the nature of which he was in the dark?

"Couldn't you and your sister come and stay with us a few days?" Julia asked, her fingers caressing the soft and dimpled cheek. "We'd love to have you?"

"Oh, I wish we could. But we can't. There's no use talking," Ethel cried. "It's sweet of you to ask us, though. Ann wouldn't want to go. I'm sure she wouldn't."

A shadow darkened the doorway.

"Where is it Ann wouldn't want to go?"

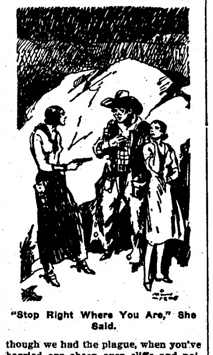
Miss Gifford came into the room, a quirt dangling from her wrist. In an unlovely khaki divided skirt and spurred boots, a revolver cased in the belt at her hip, she looked very much a denizen of the desert. But she had an aspect of efficient competence.

"I was asking your sister if you and she wouldn't come and stay for a few days at the Circle Cross. We're—lonesome just now," explained Julia.

"No, thank you," Ann answered bluntly.

"We'd so like to have you come," Julia persisted. "There aren't many of us women folk on the desert. Don't you think we ought to be friends?"

"Friends!" Ann's voice carried a laugh far removed from humor. "Why not? When we have lived here two years and none of you have come to see us, when you've all treated us as though we had the plague, when you've harried our sheep over cliffs and poisoned them, when your vile men—" She stopped abruptly, to add a moment later contemptuously, "Yes, let's be friends."



"Stop Right Where You Are," She Said.

"Phil and I didn't do any of this, did we?" Julia asked gently. "Oh, I know you haven't been treated right. But give us a chance now. If you're generous you'll give us a chance to make up for it. We'd love to try."

"I'm not generous," Ann Gifford replied, and in her eyes there burned sparks of anger. "The less we have to do with any of you the better pleased we'll be."

"That's plain enough," Julia said stiffly. "It doesn't leave much room for argument. If you won't have our friendship, why of course we can't give it."

Phil spoke. "Miss Ann, some time you might need friends, don't you reckon? You can't play a lone hand 'way off here. You ain't livin' in Denver or El Paso. You seen yoreself how it was with old Jim Yerby. He bust his laig an' would of died if Sis hadn't drapped around an' took care of him. You went up there every day an' looked after him. Folks are dependent on each other in this country. You gotta have friends here. It ain't reasonable to say you won't have 'em. We're tryin' to say, Jule an' I are, that we'd like to be neighborly even if you don't exactly want us for friends. Miss Ethel an' you, why you need good neighbors—"

"When we're looking for some one to neighbor with, Mr. Stark," Ann cut in with a swift flare of feminine ferocity, "we'll not choose any of the Circle Cross outfit."

"Why?" Julia asked.

"I'll not tell you why."

There was nothing more to be said. Ann had closed the matter by imperative veto. Phil longed for a rehearing, but knew it would be of no use. Better than his sister, he guessed at the grounds of Ann's resentment toward the Circle Cross. Most of the cowboys visiting the sheep ranch had heard whispered comment at the bunk house. Probably she had reason to think some one of them was responsible for the trouble that had come to her sister Nora.

His troubled gaze clung to Ethel. For her his heart was wrung. So soft and young she looked, so little able to cope with the harsh world into which circumstances had flung her. Ann's attitude was unjust. He knew that. But he was still a boy, and he did not know how to cope with it.

Reluctantly he followed Julia from the house and swung to the saddle.

They rode across the mesa and dipped into a draw. Round a sharp bend they moved—and came face to face with Jasper.

The meeting was a surprise to all three, to Jasper a disconcerting one.

"'Lo, Jas! Where you headin' for?" his sister asked.

He murmured something about a calf cached by its mother while the cow went to the nearest water hole. Neither Phil nor Julia voiced their doubts after they had ridden on. He was going to the Gifford sheep ranch. Both of them believed that. But why? Was it possible that in spite of Ann's watchfulness he could be holding secret meetings with Ethel? It might be so. He was good-looking in his way. There was a swagger about him some women found attractive.

Both Phil and Julia hoped that little Ethel Gifford was not one of them. Though Jasper was their brother, they much distrusted him.

CHAPTER VII

Court of Public Opinion

Jasper did not ride up to the house at the sheep ranch and announce himself. He turned up an arroyo that brought him unobserved to a pocket in the hills. Here he left his horse and climbed to the rolling ground above. Carefully, so as not to be at any time within observation from the house, he worked his way to a grove of live oaks in a draw. From this he could look down on the ranch.

He laced his hands around his mouth and gave the hoot of an owl. Twice, at intervals of half a minute, he repeated this.

Presently from the back door of the house a slim and graceful figure emerged. As she walked up the rise toward the grove a little breath of wind brought the print dress about her limbs so that the skirt clung to her knees and remodeled itself at each step. There was something in the gesture of her fine and exquisite. Momentarily she stood silent, her breast rising and falling fast from the climb. After one swift glance her eyes had fallen before his.

"What do you want with me?" she asked at last.

The hateful note of triumphant victory was in his laugh. "What do you reckon I want with you?"

The look on his face sent the color flying to her cheeks. There was nothing in the armory of her innocent and girlish coquetry to protect against such grossness.

"You—keep at me," she faltered. "You won't let me alone. If I had anything to give you—anything at all—"

She was considering in her mind, as she had done a hundred times, whether there was any way to raise money enough to buy him off, and she knew, as she had each time decided, that there was no chance of this unless she made a clean breast of her dilemma to Ann.

"I ain't onreasonable," he said. "I'm askin' you to marry me, girl. Do that, an' what I know will be buried. Fair enough, ain't it? You'll be makin' a good deal. I'll be some husband, if I do say so my own self."

At this she flared out. "Never! Never! No matter how much you bully me. I'd rather kill myself," she passionately cried, with the unconscious melodrama of youth.

"It ain't a question of you killin' yoreself, but of you sending yore sister to be hanged, or leastways to the pen for life. You'll throw in with me or I'll sure enough put her through. I never rue back. Not me." He emphasized the claim with an oath. "You can't help yoreself. I got the deadwood on you, an' I'll certainly go through."

"You wouldn't do that," she begged, one hand clasping the other small knotted fist in an agony of indecision. "No man would do that to two lone girls when—when things were like they were."

"Wouldn't I?" He thrust his face forward, lids narrowed so that his eyes were mere points of glittering light. "Grab it from me, I would. Chieto, compadre! What's eatin' you anyhow? Ain't Jasper Stark good enough for a sheepwoman?"

"I didn't say you weren't good enough. I don't want to—to marry you."

"Why don't you?"

"Because."

"That ain't a reason."

"I don't—"

She stopped. Her mind refused to let her utter the word love even in denial to him. It seemed a desecration.

"I'm mighty fond of you, honey, more'n of any girl I ever did see." He moved close and put his arms around her.

She shivered but offered no resistance. He was stronger than she. The weapon he held was one she could not parry. If he insisted on using it she must surrender, though the very thought struck all the warm joyous life out of her body. His ravenous kisses fell on cold lips and cheeks, on a soft throat line from which the pulse seemed to have died.

With a curse he released her. Ethel turned. Her sister was swiftly breasting the hill toward them. She must have seen.

With an awkward swagger the man strode forward a step or two. "Pleased to meet up with you," he laughed. "We hadn't aimed to make any announcement yet, but since you drapped in why we gotta admit the corn."

The older sister looked at Ethel, standing there white and stricken. She did not understand, but she knew instinctively that the girl hated this bully and was afraid of him. Her fierce eyes went back to Stark and stabbed at him.

"Get off our land," she ordered in a low tense voice. "If I ever see you on it again I'll kill you."

"Like you did Tom McArdle," he suggested significantly.

The blood ebbed from her face, but the hard and shining eyes did not falter. "Who says I killed him?" she asked, almost in a whisper.

"Why, I'm sayin' it right now, an' I know another fellow who could say it," he told her exultantly.

"You're a prince of liars," she told him.

"Thought you'd get away with it, didn't you? Thought nobody knew how you'd dry-gulched Tom at the cutbank? Pretty slick work, eh?"

He straddled, bow-legged in his leather chaps, fleering at her exultantly. The slim brown-faced woman looked like a child beside him, but she faced him without quailing. She might have stood for a portrait of quiet defensive resolution.

"I'm asking you what you mean."

"Plain enough, ain't it? You shot Tom from the brush, an' I can prove it."

The older sister turned to the younger. "How long has he been meeting you?"

"He came the week after—after he was killed." Ethel spoke in a low voice of distress. The pronoun of indefinite antecedent was quite clear to all present as to who was meant.

"And he has been here since?"

"Four-five times."

"Threatening you?"

Ethel nodded.

"That he would tell—what he claims to know about me? Is that it?"

"Yes."

"If you wouldn't marry him? I suppose he does you the honor to offer marriage. Or does he?" Ann spoke in a low clear note of concentrated bitterness.

"Yes."

"I'm on the square with her," Stark said virtuously. "That's the kind of a fellow I am. I'm here as a friend, understand."

"But if she doesn't marry you I'm to go to the penitentiary. Is that it?"

"She'll marry me. I ain't worried about that."

"Or you'll send me to prison," the other sister persisted.

"Have it yore own way," he laughed brutally.

The pupils of her eyes dilated as they blazed scorn at him. "You yellow coyote! If there's anything that walks as low as you—"

His teeth showed in a snarl. "Tha's no way to talk to me, you crazy hellcat. I got you where the wool's short—got you right. Get on the hook with me, an' I'll sure enough put you through."

"Do whatever you've a mind to do. But get off our ranch and stay off. If I ever see you on it again I'll pump lead into you—as I would into a diamond-back." Voice and manner were full of disgust and bitterness. She felt degraded at having to wrangle with him. It seemed to put her on his level.

"I'll get off when I'm good an' ready to go. But get it straight, girl. It's a showdown. I'm tellin' you. Me, Jas Stark." He swaggered into the shade of a live oak and rolled a cigarette for effect. "I'm tellin' you that either Ethel an' me take a trip to the sky pilot or you take one to the pen. Understand?"

"I told you to go," Ann warned.

"Don't run on me," he advised savagely. "I'm dangerous, girl. Don't fool yoreself till it's too late. I want the kid, an' I allow to have her in spite of h—l an' high water."

"You'd better go,"

"What's the sense of all this the-a-ter talk? I'm makin' a reasonable proposition?" He turned to Ethel. "Look here, honey. She ain't in this a-tall. It's between you'n me. Listen."

"I don't want to," she cried at him, a little hysterically.

"Well, you're going to listen."

He moved toward Ethel in his heavy domineering way. What his intentions were perhaps he did not quite know himself. He meant to take her into his arms and by sheer momentum ride down her will; just how, he did not know.

But Ann was taking no chances. Out of its scabbard she whipped the small revolver she carried. "Stop right where you are," she said.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Primitive Man Subject to Many Painful Ills

The feet of primitive man must have been torture to him. Stone bruises, thorns, infections and chilblains combined to put him in the mood to throw rocks at his feet so that they would hurt in a different way.

Doubtless the primitive unshod foot was a strong lithe, tough organ, but also it must have born the brunt of a good deal of trauma. In warm climates, on sandy beaches, in the South seas, they were better off than elsewhere, but the immigrants into Europe with the long cold winters must often have envied the arboreal birds.

At any rate, as soon as sandals or foot coverings were invented they became immediately popular, in spite of the advantages claimed for the "natural" foot.

Primitive man's interest in his eyes and teeth and skin and feet, however, was divided by his attention to his internal pangs. One definite thing we know about him is that he had plenty of rheumatism.

Our knowledge is so certain on this score because the only remains of most primitive men we have are the bones; and the ravages of rheumatism are exhibited in bony structure.—Logan Clendening, M. D., in the Forum and Century.

Historic Tapestry

The Bayeaux tapestry is a large piece of needlework or embroidery on a web of white canvas 214 feet long and 20 inches wide, depicting in a panorama the invasion and conquest of England by William the Conqueror. It is said to have been worked largely by Matilda, wife of the Conqueror, for the bishop of Bayeaux, for the cathedral in that town in Normandy, France.

Interesting Items ---of--- NORTH DAKOTA

McClusky.—Men of the community got together and graveled the city streets when town funds wouldn't permit the surfacing.

Gwinner.—About 500 people heard P. B. Garberg, United States district attorney, at the Gwinner Co-operative Creamery picnic.

Bismarck.—The picture of North Dakota, its history and scenic beauties, are described in a new pamphlet just issued by J. M. Devine, state commissioner of immigration.

Cooperstown.—Fifteen trucks were put into operation and gravel is being taken from the pit four miles west of here for the surfacing of nearly all state highways in Griggs county.

Rolla.—Injuries received in trying to start a tractor four months ago resulted fatally for George R. Fox, resident of Island Lake township, near Mylo, for 49 years.

Mapleton.—Joseph and Mary Schmidt were given 30 days suspended jail sentence and assessed costs of $14.60 when they pleaded guilty to a charge of operating a public dance without a license.

Wahpeton.—Completely eliminating appropriations for roads and bridges, Richland county commissioners have set a tentative budget $40,000 below that of a year ago. A public hearing is scheduled.

Minot.—Minot's school board is working to cut its budget $44,000 below a year ago to stay within the statutory limitation on mill levy as a result of adoption of the reduced valuation measure.

Bowbells.—Bowbells city park board will make no levy on taxpayers this year. The board members calculate enough delinquent taxes will be collected to pay park expenses the coming year.

Bottineau.—Over one hundred Masons from all parts of the state, were in attendance at the first annual outdoor meeting of the Councils of R. and S. Masters, of the state of North Dakota, held on Masonic Island, Lake Metigoshe, recently.

Bismarck.—Contractors from over the state and various other states were gathering at Bismarck last week preparatory to the opening of bids for the $2,000,000 capitol building which is said to be the largest construction project to be undertaken in this state.

Ryder.—One dollar a day for haying, $1.25 for harvesting, and $1.75 per day for an 11-hour day of threshing will be the prevailing wages paid during the coming months, it was decided at a conference of farmers from Grand Forks, Steele, Griggs, and Nelson counties, held at Aneta recently.

Towner.—Gold miners of the vicinity of Denbigh plan to install cyanide plants which will take several months to determine profit in seeking the precious metal. Jess Willard bought a dredging machine in Colorado which is being assembled and will offer another interesting test when in operation.

Wahpeton.—In Rufus Burton, Wahpeton has an astronomer who is fast becoming an authority upon stars, planets, their orbits, revolutions and other matters concerning the heavenly bodies. With a powerful telescope he has been following the planets day after day for the past ten years and studying, calculating and observing.

Crosby.—R. W. Frazier will continue as superintendent of highways and weed commissioner in a compromise agreement with the county commissioners who declared the office vacant last summer when Frazier was in California. He called attention to a regulation placing his term at two years ending in April, but agreed to resign effective Jan. 1, 1933.

Cando.—Near the geographical center of the North American continent, thousands of Canadian and American citizens gathered to dedicate a natural monument to peace and called upon nations of the world to view it as an example of good will and understanding that can exist between countries.

Dickinson.—The Dickinson Slope Wool Growers association has accepted a cash bid of 7½ cents per pound for its pool from Cordingley and Company, Inc., Boston. The pool contains about 600,000 pounds of good quality wool. Last year the product sold for 13 cents per pound, two years ago for 22½ cents. Sales locally, however, have been reported as low as 5 cents this year.

Bismarck.—Gov. George F. Shafer has termed negotiations between the United States and Canada providing for joint construction of the St. Lawrence seaway as an important step toward establishing industry in the midst of agriculture and revitalizing economic development in central regions of the country.

Ashley.—A stone probably saved the life of Benjamin Helfenstein, 13 miles west of here. Towing a hayrake with a wagon, his horses ran away and he fell in front of the rake and was dragged a considerable distance before the stone tipped up the rake and released him.

Ellendale.—Fifty-three members of the Dickey County Wool Growers association shipped 34,300 pounds of wool to Fargo last week. This wool is being unloaded at Fargo for grading, after which it will be shipped by grade lots direct to Boston for storage and sale.

Electric Light Speeds Up "Activity" of Biddy

The modern chicken farm which hatches all of its chickens in incubators also uses electric light to encourage egg production, especially for the Easter season. This method has passed beyond the experimental stage and many large-scale chicken-raising establishments are now employing it with marked success.

From early November to the beginning of April the day's work of a hen is unduly shortened by lack of daylight. But when the days during that period are artificially lengthened by the use of electric light in the fowl houses, the hens stay awake, scratch about more, eat more food, and lay more eggs.

That is the whole theory, and it works out in practice. A very important part of its value lies in the fact that during the period from November to the end of March eggs usually cost the consumer more, and so bring a much better profit to the producer.

It has been found that hens subjected to the electric light treatment, however, do not necessarily lay an increased number of eggs in the course of a year.

The United States Department of Agriculture has long been studying the best kind of illumination for chicken houses, and is endeavoring to determine the right intensity of illumination.

Reduced 30 Pounds Never Felt Better

Safe Way to Lose Fat

Take the case of Miss Madelone Crowley, for instance, who lives in Little Rock, Ark. Just read her letter:

"I have used Kruschen Salts for one year—when I started I weighed 140 pounds—now I weigh 110 pounds and never felt better in my life."

That's the big reason a host of men and women take Kruschen to lose weight—as the fat goes you gain in health—skin clears—eyes grow bright—activity replaces indolence.

Take one-half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water every morning before breakfast—cut down on fatty meats, potatoes and sweets—a jar of Kruschen that costs but a trifle lasts 4 weeks—get it at any drugstore in the world—but for your health's sake demand and get Kruschen Salts.

Tell-Tale Invention

"Please arrest me" is in effect, the message conveyed by a new German invention designed to aid the police in capturing "hit-and-run" automobile drivers. The moment a car hits a person or another vehicle, the device, located under the chassis, is said to raise a while plate with a winking red light above the license plate, and also automatically to disconnect and lock the speedometer, thus showing the rate of speed at which the car was traveling at the time of the accident.

The invention, of course, is valueless unless laws compelling its universal use are passed and unless the key is kept by the police to prevent unscrupulous motorists from tampering with the telltale mechanism.

Waiting for the Signal

Sister was visiting in the country and auntie had promised her she could gather the eggs. She was up bright and early the first morning and after making many fruitless trips to the henhouse, asked:

"Aunt Mildred, how can you tell when those hens lay?"

"When they cackle," she was told.

She stood around a while and finally said:

"Auntie, has those hens giggled yet?"

Gold Digger

"Daughter," said her dad, "how does it come you go out with a different young man every night?"

"Oh," she yawned, "most of my boy friends have had their salaries cut and they can't afford more than one date a week with me now."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

EVEN WILD ZULUS TAKE TO "TALKIES"

White Man's Genius Scores Another Triumph.

Zululand, still the abode of witch-doctors, evil spirits, and polygamy, is being tamed by the talkies. A South African film company, equipped with the latest type of sound apparatus, has acquired the right to "shoot" pictures in the heart of a vast native reserve into which the probing white fingers of civilization have scarcely penetrated.

The first sound-film of the Zulus was made last year when the impis of Solomon Dinizulu and other paramount chiefs assembled in force outside Eshowe to bid farewell to their beloved high commissioner, the earl of Athlone. For the first time in history townsmen heard the menace of naked black feet marching across the veld. Then, to finish all, the full-throated, never-to-be-forgotten "Bayete!" the royal salute shouted in honor of the Great White Chief.

Unlike most subject races, the Zulu retains the characteristics we always associate with him. His stabbing assegai may have been beaten into a plowshare, but he still carries his knobkerrie and a cowhide shield; he still barters his cattle for wives, years a moochie, or abbreviated loincloth, and has a physique any white man would envy—provided, that is, he has never left his native kraal to work in the towns.

The talkie era in Zululand has not dawned without incident. The camera man, used to taking pictures of "boys" in the mine compounds along the Reef, finds he has to adopt a different technique when he sets out to film raw Zulus.

He must have skilled interpreters for one thing, boundless patience for another. He must not attempt to take a film without first of all consulting the local oracle, in other words, the witch-doctor. If the spirit of M'kosi's great-grandmother decrees that the film must be taken in the middle of a thunderstorm, the white man will have to use all his persuasive powers to hear the verdict of another ancestor less ignorant of sound-photography. Even then the "movie" man has to overcome the aversion of all pure-bred Zulus to being photographed; he has to demonstrate that the "eye-that-speaks" is harmless.

Mr. Joseph Albrecht, one of the pioneers of South Africa film production, is looking for a Zulu "star." All he asks is—she must not be afraid of the camera.

To accustom Zulus to talkies, the first speaking film of themselves was shown recently at an open-air indaba in Ginginhlovu. Warriors and women from all parts of the territory came along to see what the white man's latest medicine was like. For the first five minutes there was deep silence, then a startled chorus of "O-ow's" and wild pandemonium. The audience took to their heels as one man—but they came back! Talkies had justified themselves.—London Tit-Bits.

Accommodating

Whimsical little Nellie spent the afternoon erecting tombstones with her building blocks. She called her mother to inspect the finished task, saying that she had one for each member of the family. Mother said:

"You don't seem to have any for Marie." Nellie verified this, and then remarked:

"Oh, well, she can have mine, and I'll keep on living."

Fish Stories

A red salmon tagged by the bureau of fisheries in Alaskan waters was found 44 days later in a Serbian stream 1,300 miles away. In respense to 15,000 requests, the bureau distributed 138,392,000 game fish last year, which is only 3 per cent of the number it hatched. Incidentally, the bureau has tagged 1,500 sea trout for study.

NOT ALWAYS WISE TO TRUST "CHARMS"

Some Have Been Known to Work Backwards.

Little Eva is the most superstitious person I know. She wears an elephant's hair ring on her finger and carries a rabbit's foot in her bag. She observes all the known ceremonies for prevention of misfortune, such as saying "bread and butter" when walking with a friend and the two are separated by passing on opposite sides of a lamp post. Whenever she is unwise enough to remind the unkind fates that she has not had a cold in a long time, she finds that it confuses them a little if she knocks on wood and it cripples their efforts at revenge.

Recently she presented a friend a rabbit's foot for her protection, but it played her false. Shortly thereafter the friend was in an automobile accident, and had her scalp ripped open for quite a space. But did this disaster shake Eva's faith in efficacy of rabbit pedals? Not at all! She had two explanations ready in a moment. One was that inasmuch as she had not killed the rabbit herself she could not be sure that it was the left hind foot. This is the only foot that has any real magic in it, but commercial dealers are not careful to ascertain the original location of the amputated foot.

The other explanation is that everybody has two contrary signs, and perhaps in this instance the rabbit's foot worked backwards. You just can't trust magic not to reverse itself for some people. Take four-leaf clovers. To the vast majority they bring good luck, but to little Eva they bring illness, disappointment and disaster, and she would sooner pick poison ivy than the treacherous clover. Then there are the terrible black cats, the sight of which is fraught with disaster for so many. With little Eva the omen reverses itself. She is a cat worshiper and has raised dozens of black ones. She became so used to their criss-crossing before her that it established a sort of immunity. She discovered it once when a black cat saved her life. The animal ran across her path and she stooped to pet it just before two automobiles crashed together and piled up on the sidewalk at the exact spot where she would have been passing if she hadn't stopped to pet the cat.

Our office boy is not so lucky. The last time a black cat ran across his path he had four flat tires before the day was done. True, the tires weren't so good anyway, but they would have held up very well if it hadn't been for the cat. He has very bad luck with brooms, too. Every time he is hit by one he gets arrested for something. Once when he was sweeping out his father's store, he hit a friend playfully with the broom. "Oh, don't do that," the friend cried, "I'll be arrested!" And within 24 hours he was riding to jail in the Black Maria for speeding. Little Eva says it is a sure sign and that one reason she hates housework is that brooms are such a menace. The vacuum cleaner has helped to keep some of our best women out of jail. Eva thinks it would be a smart idea for all policemen to carry a broom with which to hit obstreperous gangsters.

Down in the island of Haiti they have a sweet little custom that Eva is thinking of adopting. They make an effigy of their enemies which they torture with good effect. In order to make the torture effective they must get a piece of their enemy to paste on the effigy. A hair from his head, a paring from his toe nail, or even the dirt upon which he has spat is sufficient. The witch doctor then puts a curse on the image, and all that is necessary is to stick a pin in the effigy in the exact spot where you want the enemy to hurt. The only trouble is that it doesn't work so well on Americans. When the United States marines went to Haiti the natives made countless effigies with which to torture the intruders, who guffawed loudly at the spectacle, and never had a single pain. This would argue that the enemy must be possessed of a lively belief in magic before he could be discomfited, but it is worth a trial.

No matter how much common sense people have, few of them are free from some form of superstition. There are those who swoon if they sit down to a table that has thirteen round it. Others can't walk under a ladder without falling in a fit, but Eva is the only one I know who believes in every form of balderdash in existence. Even when the rabbit foot slips it has no effect on her belief in charms or her vivid respect for voodooism.—Indianapolis News.

Biblical Fortress of Sichem

Geographically Sichem was one of the most important points in Palestine. Situated in the narrow mountain pass between Mounts Garizim and Ebal—the high road of travel between the east and west—it blocked the route from the Jordan valley to the coast plain and protected the coastal region from the invasions of the nomadic hordes coming from the east. Its strategic function is thus obvious. Sichem offered a bold spectacle: with the horizontal lines of the walls, one superimposed upon the other; with the gigantic dimensions of its stones, all concentrated in the elliptic city plan, the fortress loomed in the landscape. Standing at its side, the two natural bulwark, Mounts Garizim and Ebal, reinforced the impression of impregnability.

Even today one who stands at the foot of these gigantic walls has the sense of being, as the Biblical people wailed, "in our own sight as grasshoppers. One is impressed by its sheer physical strength, and understands the fearful panic of the Israelites as they listened in Kadesh Barnea to the reports which their spies brought back from the Land of Canaan.

The builders of this fortification system were the Hittites, who were known to have dwelt in Sichem as early as the time of Jacob, 1500 B. C. (Gen. 34).

Public Warned of Fire Menace

This is the time of the year when every citizen should be careful as to how they handle fire. The ground is so dry here now that a fire, if started, would travel too fast to be checked until it had done a lot of damage.

According to reports reaching this office, one farmer out in the vicinity of Mud Lake has already had the misfortune to have several hay stacks burned by a peat fire that crawled out of a burnout and started a grass fire that traveled around and, as far as we know, is still going.

Unless checked these big peat fires on the north of Mud Lake may cost the farmers in that territory their hay, crops, and even their homes as, a prairie or grass fire can get out of control in a few hours and destroy everything.

We suggest that the people living out there, call upon their local fire warden and request that he have men put to work in the fire area and stamp out the worst, if not all those peat fires.

The state can hire unemployed men cheap now and, we believe that under the right supervision a bunch of men could go into the fire area and show us some results. Lets see something being done before its too late.

An Illusory Law

The bank deposit guaranty law in any form is a snare and a delusion, declares a banker in a state where it has been tried, adding: "It is a license and encouragement to irresponsible banks and banking and penalizes capital solvency and prudent banking. It creates a sense of security in the minds of the unthinking and uninformed that is false and impossible to be realized on ultimately. To compare it to legitimate insurance is without reason and absurd. It jeopardizes the solvency of all banks and the safety of all depositors for the theoretical safety of a few. Guaranty schemes always have been, are and always will be impotent, futile and disastrous. It is not new. Has been tried, failed and discarded at intervals for more than 100 years in this country. No well-informed, honest and intelligent mind can accept it in principle or practice. Competent bank supervision and restriction of banks to territory that will warrant sufficient capital investment and accounts is the only sane and honest course and will afford all the guaranty the depositing public is entitled to as compared with all other human affairs."

Butter, Oleo, and Taxes

Friends of oleo who feel that special taxes imposed on it are unfair seem to forget that butterfat is also taxed, and taxed plenty. B. G. Rogers, of California, where oleo people are trying to do away with a 15 cent tax, says that "their claim of discrimination against oleo because there is no tax on butter won't hold water. The tax on the dairy herd, on the buildings, land and machinery used in the production of milk, as well as trucks for transportation and manufacturing plants and other property connected with the production and manufacture of butter constitutes a tax on butter which will exceed 15 cents a pound.

"Therefore this tax of 15 cents per pound on oleo is necessary to make that commodity bear its just portion of the burden of state government, since the oleo is manufactured outside the state and a large proportion of the ingredients come from foreign countries, much of it duty-free."

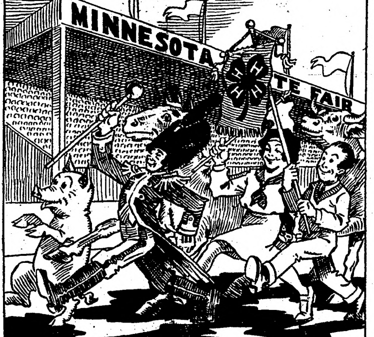
MINNESOTA MARCHES ON!



September 3 to 10

20 Years Ago

Items Clipped From The Northern Light for the Issue of Aug. 16, 1912.

Axel Nelson, Svenke Svenkeson, and Hans Stensrud bought a separator and, with their big Rumely tractor, were all ready for a long threshing run in the Mud Lake region.

The Ostlund boys drilled a well for Swan Carlson and struck water at 72 feet.

The attorney-general at Washington, D.C., ruled that the Mud Lake bottom was open for homesteading, and could not be divided among the riparian owners, as it was claimed Mud Lake was not navigable before it was drained.

The Progressive ('BullMoose') Party nominated Theodore Roosevelt and Hiram W. Johnson at an enthusiastic session.

A Letter from Svenke

Foxford, Sask., May 8, 1932

Mr. K. O. Flakne,
Holt, Minnesota.

Dear Friend:

Received your letter a long time since, and was sure glad to hear from you.

Well, things are not going bad at all with me considering the hard times we are having. Am running about the same kind of a show as in Minn., trying to do a lot but don't get much done.

Am farming on the homestead and running a saw mill. Had good crops the last two years. But it don't seem to do me any good. Last year I was going to fire guard around my granary and burnt it up this year. I have been up here at the sawmill and some one had stole my wheat in the spring. However, things are going fairly good with me so far Have a good quarter section and expect to get my patent soon as I made application for proof some time ago and received word that it was granted so it's all right I think.

Cut a lot of lumber last year and have quite a run this year, so am awfully busy nearly all the time. Am hiring a man to put in my crop on the homestead. Got about 60 acres broke there.

Am three miles from the siding on the new C. P. railroad. There is only one small store there yet and I have eight miles to another small new town.

Do you ever see or hear anything of Halfdan Olson? Haven't heard from him for a long time.

Best regards, S. G. Svenkeson

K. O. Flakne received the above letter from S. G. Svenkeson at Foxford, Sask., Canada. We know you are glad to hear how Svenke is making it.

Mr. Flakne answered the letter but, due to the length of his letter, we are unable to publish it now, but wish to state that Mr. Flakne in his letter told Mr. Svenkeson something about the Mud Lake deal and how he has been treated in the matter and what he thinks about it, and several other details which we presume Mr. Svenkeson has read about in the Holt Weekly News which has followed him on his way of pioneering in Canada.

Still Harvesting Honey

In our news of 20 years ago last week we mentioned that Oscar Hanson harvested about 20 pounds of honey which a swarm of bees had left in a corner of their farm home here.

The same swarm of bees (or rather their descendants) is still in the house on the old Oscar Hanson farm, which Nels Ness and family now occupy. The bees are still manufacturing their annual output of honey.

Threshing Starts in Vicinity

Threshing has commenced here this week with several rigs pulling out on shock runs. We are not positive but, according to oil truck men here, W. C. Paskewitz was the first one out with a machine this year.

Theo. Halvorson made a trip out to Hoople, N. Dak., Monday. He stated that all the crops were in good shape with the exception of a few potato fields that were coming along a little slow on account of dry weather.

Mrs. Victor Johnson and Mrs. K. O. Burtness called at the H. O. Hanson home Tuesday evening.

Werner and family, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Sorum and family, Mr. and Mrs. John Hagberg and family and Joseph Nelson gathered at the home of Jacob Nelson on Sunday to help him celebrate his 75th birthday.

Mr. Nelson was presented with many gifts and a sum of money as a token of remembrance of the day.

Feeding Cows Hay

For the first time in ever so many years, according to the old timers of the community, the farmers here are now forced to feed their stock hay in order to pull them thru until they get their crops threshed. But we can't see enough green growth in the stubble fields to keep them going long and, as we have not had any rain, the meadows burned right up after they were cut.

With no open range and the pastures all shot, it looks as if the feeding of hay will have to be kept up until next spring.

SYNOPSIS

Wilson McCann, young Arizona ranchman, finds an old friend, Jim Yerby, with a broken leg. Julia Stark, daughter of Matthew Stark, inveterate enemy of the McCanns, is with him. Jasper, Julia's brother, attempts to assassinate Wilson. Ann Gifford, with her young sister, Ethel, are sheep raisers, and on that account unpopular with the cattlemen. "Night riders" shoot a McCann rider. Peter McCann, Wilson's father, offers a reward for the disclosure of their identity. Wilson McCann horsewhips Jasper, he making practically no resistance. Matthew Stark posts notice he will kill Wilson McCann on sight. Ann Gifford's tragedy is the fate of her dead sister, Nora, betrayed and abandoned by her lover. Jasper Stark and Carl Gitner, known as a "killer," hold secret conferences. A Stark rider, Tom McArdle, is believed by the Starks to have been killed by the McCanns, but rumor links his name with that of Nora Gifford. Matthew Stark is killed, from ambush. Julia finds him dead, with Wilson McCann stooping over him. She and Phil, her younger brother, accuse McCann of the killing, despite his vehement denial. Wilson is shot from the chapparal, while standing over Matthew Stark's body. Believing him dying, the Starks have him taken to their home. Dave Stone, Stark rider, a Texan with a record as a "killer," openly doubts Wilson's guilt. Jasper is disinherited by his father's will. Wilson McCann is restored to health. Jasper Stark, despite the girl's aversion, seeks to persuade Ethel Gifford to marry him, holding over her the threat of revealing Ann as the slayer of Tom McArdle. Ann drives him from the ranch, defying him.

His stride faltered. He stood still, taken by surprise. There was about her such an air of tense feminine ferocity that his purpose was shaken.

"I wasn't aimin' to hurt her none," he explained sullenly.

"Get away from her."

He hesitated, his vanity in arms. The position was a humiliating one, but he did not see any way out of it just now.

"All right. It's yore say-so," he admitted vindictively. "But don't come belly-achin' to me when you get arrested. I've done give you yore chance an' you wouldn't take it. Suits me if it does you."

He turned and walked down into the arroyo where he had left his horse.

Ethel looked piteously at her sister. "Is it true—what he said?" she asked.

Ann did not ask to what she referred. There was no need to specify. In the forefront of both their minds was the death of Tom McArdle and Ann's relation to it.

"It's true."

They stared at each other, horror in their eyes.

"I . . . I was afraid so," Ethel murmured. "It's been awful for me, too. I was awake when you came in that morning—and I knew something was wrong by the way you looked. I pretended to be asleep, but I saw you clean the rifle. You acted so . . . so kinda dead for days . . . like you were numb. And when this Jasper Stark came and told me one day when you were out that you had . . . done it . . . why I just knew you had."

She ended with a wail of distress.

They went into each other's arms and sobbed together. After a time, when they had cried themselves out, Ann told her story.

She had spent the night at one of their sheep camps and was riding home in the early morning when she met Tom McArdle. He had stopped her, though she had tried to push past him, and she had lashed him savagely in a spute of words for what he had done to Nora.

"I thought of her, lying out there under the ground in California, and of him riding around big as Cuffey," Ann said to her sister. "But that wasn't the worst of it. You know how he kept coming to the house . . . afterward, pretending he wanted to hear about our dear girl and all the time trying to make up to you. You know how I told him never to come again. Well, after I had flayed him that morning he bowed and thanked me with a sneer and rode away. When he got to the edge of the road above the outbank he called to tell me he'd be over to see you Thursday. You don't know how hatefully he said it. Something in me snapped. I didn't have time to think. I just fired at him and he threw up his hands and slid from his horse down the cutbank. I didn't wait to see any more, but just rode away fast as I could. For I knew by the way he fell that . . . he was dead."

"You poor, poor girl!" Ethel held the slender figure close as though to keep her from the cruel reach of the law that was going to snatch her away and lock her up for years. "Oh darling, why didn't you tell me?"

"I don't care, if you don't hate me for doing it," Ann replied brokenly.

So, with love, they comforted each other.

* * * * * * * *

It was characteristic of Jasper that he did not at once go to the authorities and charge Ann Gifford with the murder of Tom McArdle. Instead, he wrote an anonymous letter to Sheriff Le Page and accused her of it.

He did not want to burn his bridges behind him. It would be better, he reflected, to see what the effect would be of a covert imputation. Hank would very likely go out to the sheep ranch and ask questions. This would frighten not only Ethel but Ann, too, in spite of the high hand she had taken with him. They might come to terms. Anyhow, it could do no harm to wait a few days and watch developments.

Most of his waiting was done at Pedro's place, a bottle in front of him. But as the days passed he grew impatient and decided to talk the matter over with Carl Gitner. It might be good idea to send the big Texan up to the sheep ranch just to show the Giffords that he really had the goods on them.

At the ranch Jasper pulled up at the bunk house and swung down. Inside he found Gitner and Stone. The former was riveting a stirrup leather.

"Come to say adios to yore dear friend Wils McCann?" he jeered.

"Whatjamean?" demanded Stark.

"Why, ain't you heard the good news?" Gitner affected polite surprise. "Our dear guest's done mended so much he's allowin' to hit the trail today. The old man's comin' with a wagon to get him. Pretty soon, if Mr. Wilson McCann continues to improve, as the papers say, he'll be able to bump off another Stark or two maybe."

Stone was honing a hunting knife. He had acknowledged the arrival of Jasper by a nod. Now he spoke.

"Wils McCann didn't kill Matt." He said it quietly, without emphasis.

"Hmp! He was caught, you might say, right in the act." This from Jasper, with exasperation. "What's the sense in sayin' he didn't do it?"

"I went over the ground soon as I could an' read sign. Wils didn't shoot yore father, any more than I did."

"Phil tells me you gave him an' Jule that line of talk, Dave. Tha's why she's lettin' this murderer get away from us." He ripped out an oath of savage anger. "I've a good mind to plug him from the chaparral my own self."

"I wouldn't do that, Jas. I'd hire some one. Maybe you could get Carl," the little Texan murmured.

The words seemed to fall almost casually, except for the fact that Stone's eyes were full on those of the man he addressed. They had a surprising effect. The red of Jasper's skin faded to a sickly yellow. His jaw dropped.

Gitner was made of stiffer stuff. He turned snarling on Stone. "What the blue blazes you mean by that?" he demanded with a series of crackling oaths.

Stone's face was hard as jade and held as much expression. "Why, what could I mean, Carl? Only that you're a better shot than Jas, an' if he wanted any killin' done looks like it would be reasonable for him to hire you to do it."

"Say, what's eatin' you, Dave?" Gitner's eyes were closely slitted. He had dropped the stirrup leather and his hands hung free for action. "Lemme get you right. What makes you figure Wils McCann didn't bushwhack the old man?"

"Several things, Carl. First off, if Wils did it he wouldn't 'a' been found lingerin' around. More likely he's 'a' been hittin' the high spots for a getaway. I cut sign on the ground an' I know Matt was shot by some one lying in the irrigation ditch. The fellow got scared afterward an' turned water into the ditch to wipe out his tracks. We know Wils didn't do that. I'm not satisfied that the same guy didn't shoot both yore father an' McCann."

"Sounds reasonable," sneered Gitner. "Go ahead. Tell us who he is."

"I went up to the head gate an' studied the ground some. McCann's tracks were there. He'd been fixin' it. We know that. Covering his tracks in two places there was the print of a big boot run over at the heel with a nail sticking out."

The eyes of Stone and Gitner were fastened as though drawn together by powerful magnets. Jasper felt a cold chill at his heart. He flashed one look at Gitner's boots.

"How d'you know which was Wils McCann's track an' which wasn't?" Gitner asked.

"I took his boots later an' fitted them to the tracks."

There was a moment of chill sinister silence.

"Did you take any boots an' fit them to the other tracks?" Gitner asked, almost in a murmur.

"Why no, Carl. Whose boots would I take?"

The issue between the men had come to crisis. No words were spoken. For that question was a low-voiced challenge. It called for an answer.

There was silence, heavy and oppressive, while one might have counted twenty. Watching Gitner closely, Stone could almost read his exact thoughts. Should he draw now and be done with it? Or had he better wait?

"Well, you know what you mean. I don't, an' I don't give a d—n." Gitner turned, bravado in his manner, to Jasper. "Me, I'm headed for the chuck wagon. Get a move on you, Jas."

Stark breathed again. Carl had chosen to postpone the question of the day to a more favorable time.

The two men left the bunkhouse together. Through the open door Stone watched them walk to the eating room. He had done an unwise thing, some men would have said. At least he had done it on purpose. He had smoked them into the open. Beyond a reasonable doubt he was convinced that he had found the man who had shot Matthew Stark and Wilson McCann. He had made a guess that was a center shot.

Out of the situation he got one flicker of amusement. He would be willing to give odds that when he saw Carl Gitner after his next visit to town the big man would either be wearing a new pair of boots or the heels of the old ones would be rebuilt.

* * * * * * * *

It was Wilson McCann's first long ride since his recovery. The weeks had slipped away and his splendid vitality had asserted itself. Health had flowed back into his veins. He and his brother Lyn were jogging along toward Mesa. The fierce heat of summer was almost broken, but they still looked up into a brazen sky and clouds of alkaline dust choked them.

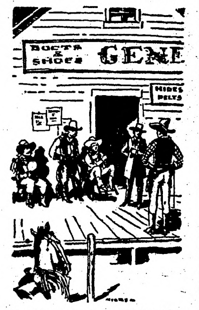
With an eye carefully measuring his brother's strength, Lyn suggested that they throw off and rest at the river.

"I'm kinda off my feed these days," he added apologetically.

Wilson smiled at this duplicity. "Suits me," he assented. "I'd hate to see you wore to a frazzle an' you with no more appetite than you got. I was worried about you traveling so far on nothing but nine flannel cakes, eleven biscuits, two-three eggs, one small steak no bigger than a plate, an' three cups o' coffee."

"It ain't what a man eats, but how it nourishes him," argued the bronzed young giant.

At the edge of the dry river, in a little group of cottonwoods a couple of hundred yards from the road, they dismounted and Lyn unsaddled. With their rifles by their sides they lay down and Wilson rested.



"The Sheriff Went Out to the Sheep Ranch and Had a Talk With Miss Ann."

"It does kinda take the tuck outa me," he admitted. "I reckon I'm not right stout yet."

Purgatory river the Indians called it from the Spanish name, or the River of Lost Souls, but the unsentimental cowpuncher had corrupted it to Picket Wire river.

Lying on his back, one leg cocked over the other, Lyn mused aloud. "Something's changed Dad. He ain't so rambunctious since you an' him got back from the Circle Cross. All the boys have strict orders not to get into trouble with any of the Stark riders. He acts like he's bumped up against something that set him thinking."

Wilson thought of his father, big, strong, slightly bowlegged, hard eyes set in a leathery face, a dominating man with many friends and some bitter enemies. What Lyn said was true. There had come a change in him. He spoke less. His manner was gentler at times. More than once his oldest son had come on him in the dusk brooding in an armchair. This was not at all like the Peter McCann he had known a score of years.

"Figure it out for yourself, Lyn. Julia Stark an' that young brother of hers saved my life an' kept right on saving it. They scared off the killer. They took me home an' looked after me. They sent for Doc Sanders. She nursed me, that girl did, like I was her brother, though her father lay there dead beside me an' she thought I'd killed him. They let Dad come an' live in the house, an' every minute of the time they watched to see we weren't shot while we were there. Do you reckon, if they had been given half a chance Jas Stark an' that Gitner would ever have let us get away from there alive? Not on yore tintype. But the girl an' young Phil an' Stone an' Rafferty rode with us, bunched round the wagon, till we met up with the boys. That puts it right up to us, don't it? Dad's millin' this over in his head. He's a white man, Peter McCann is. He's figurin' on finding a way out that won't leave him feeling like a coyote?"

"How about you?"

"I'll not crook a finger against one of 'em. How can I now?"

"What kind of a girl is she?" Lyn asked, his curiosity stirred. "She used to be a regular li'l catamount at school."

Wilson measured his words carefully to achieve a dispassionate manner of casual criticism. "I reckon she's got that temper yet. There's 'most usually a breeze around her neighborhood, I notice. A sure enough li'l ginger mill. She's let loose on me some. O' course she hates the ground I walk on. Naturally she would, since she figures I shot her father. But she's all right, Lyn—there every way, high, low, jack an' the game. I don't quite know how to tell you what she's like. You remember that li'l palomino racer we usta have—what a fine high-strung, high-steppin' thoroughbred the filly was, game to the marrow an' true as steel. Well, that's Julia Stark."

Lyn rolled and lit a cigarette. "I ain't spoke a word to her since she was a long-legged colt with her mane all flying wild an' black eyes snappin' at you like live coals. But what you say goes with me. If she hadn't been there both ways from the ace she sure would have let you die the day of the rookus. Funny about women, how they tangle up the lives of he-men. When we was out on Tin Cup the other day Wes Tapscott got to talkin' about Dad an' Matt Stark. We was breakin' camp an' I was loadin' the crossbuck. He got to joshin' me while I was fixin' the lash rope to throw the diamond hitch an' somethin' I said reminded him of old days. Seems that Dad an' Matt usta run together when they were young. They skylarked a heap in Dodge an' Hays City an' Denver when they were out with trail herds. Seems they both fell in love with the same girl an' that busted their friendship wide open."

The older brother nodded. "Jessie Farwell her name was. She married Stark."

"It would be right funny if this Julia Stark was to put an end to this feud after her mother started it before any of us were born."

The brooding eyes of Wilson were not focussed on anything within range of their vision. He made no comment on what his brother had said, but his mind was full of it. Why not? Surely the thing she had done made it impossible for the McCanns to pursue the feud, to fight for hair-line rights bitterly and savagely. She had cut the ground from under their feet. If there was any generosity in them they would have to abstain from hostility even though friendship was not practicable.

"Do you reckon they're liable to push the case against you for killin' Matt Stark?" asked Lyn presently.

Wilson was out on bail furnished by his father. He had been formally arrested by the sheriff, even though it was understood that no conviction would be possible in Arizona after Stark had given public notice that he meant to kill young McCann on sight.

"I don't reckon," Wilson replied. "They haven't got a leg to stand on and they know it. Even if I had killed him I was justified."

"Who did kill him? You don't reckon any of our boys could of done it and be holdin' out on us."

"No, I don't. I'm not guessin', Lyn—not out loud."

Lyn suddenly sat up and listened. There had come to him down the wash the sound of a horse's hoof striking a stone. Presently voices drifted to the two in the grove. In a feud country it pays to watch travelers whose intentions have not been declared. Both of the McCanns reached silently for their rifles.

Into view rode Carl Gitner and Jasper Stark. They crossed the dry river and passed into the desert landscape of light and color and air. The McCanns watched them go.

It was Lyn who spoke first. "I'm wonderin', Wils," he drawled.

"Yes."

"Whether if those beauties had been here and we'd been ridin' across the river there we'd still be good insurance risks."

"One of us anyhow wouldn't; likely both of us."

"Both of us. They'd never a-let me get away to tell it. It's a cinch they wouldn't. That's one trouble in dealing with scalawags like them. You can't play the game their way, an' it don't make an even bet."

Presently Lyn resaddled and they took up again the sandy road. They rode into Mesa and drew up in front of Basford's emporium. Public opinion sat on the porch in session. Simp Shell was there as usual, fat and overflowing. Basford lounged in the doorway. Doctor Sanders held down the top step, his back against a post. In a chair tilted to the wall, lounged Curt Quinn, just in from his ranch.

Simp was talking, guardedly. "Course I don' know a thing but what Hank told me. He got this anlonymous letter an' he went out an' had a talk with her. She hadn't a word to say but just one thing: prove it." He broke off to greet the new arrivals. "'Lo, Lyn—Wils! How you makin' it? We're all mighty glad to see you 'live an' kickin', boy. Sure are."

"Same here," agreed the recovered invalid.

"How you feeling, Wils? Seems to me this is a right long ride for you to be taking so soon," Doctor Sanders said.

"Oh, I got restless to hear the gent's gossip circle," grinned Wilson. "What's the latest? Don't anything new ever happen?"

"Well, there's this anlonymous letter Hank got."

"Hank who?"

"Hank Le Page—sheriff of this here county. Understand, I'm jest tellin' you what happened. Hank he got this anlonymous letter tellin' him that Miss Ann Gifford was the person who shot Tom McArdle." Simp spread his fat hands in disclaimer. "Like I said before, I don't know a thing but what Hank told me. Course I've done heard rumors about reasons she might have for not liking Tom. I reckon you all heard 'em, for that matter. Jas Stark says he heard her warn Tom never to show up at the sheep ranch again, or if he did she'd fill him plumb full of lead."

"The sheriff went out to the sheep ranch and had a talk with Miss Ann," Doctor Sanders contributed. "She wasn't hardly civil. Good as told him to get busy and prove it if he could."

"Funny she didn't welcome him more cordial," the young man answered with obvious sarcasm. "You'd think she would ask Hank to stay to dinner when he come out merely to inquire if she murdered a man from the chaparral. I can't understand her being sharp about a li'l thing like that."

"Didn't know she was a friend of yours, Wils, or I wouldn't a-mentioned it." This from Simp.

"She isn't. Far as I know she's got no friends. You can put me on record right here as sayin' that this country here has been hog mean to those three girls on the sheep ranch."

"I've had notions that way myself at times," Lyn said, backing his brother. "Just because old Gifford was a stubborn cantankerous old son-of-a-gun don't prove his nieces weren't nice girls. Me, I got no use for a sheepman, but you got to treat women human."

"Because some darned fool writes an anonymous letter we've got to begin persecuting those two lone women again. We're certainly in fine business." Wilson spoke with heat.

"No use to get all het up, boy. We ain't persecutin' her none," Simp objected. "We ain't even sayin' she did it. Maybe she can prove an alibi. It's no penitentiary offense to talk, Wils."

"By Gad, it ought to be, for when you talk about a woman you damn her good name. What do we know about this? I don't suppose for a minute she did it. But say for argument she did. Say she killed a man, though I'd bet my boots she didn't. All right. What kind of a man? How'd she come to do it? Why? What had he done to her or to those she was like a mother to?"

"We're not discussing the justification," Doctor Sanders replied.

"No, you're just hintin'. Come to that I've killed two-three men myself. So have you, Simp. An' you, Basford."

"I never did," Shell sputtered indignantly.

"Sure you have. Murder's in the heart. Tha's where it is. You don't have to pull a trigger to kill a man. You can kill him in yore thoughts. It's seein' red. It's bein' so crazy mad you'd do it in a minute if you seen a chanct."

"Oh, well!"

Curt Quinn let down his chair and got to his feet. "The boy's right, at that. Give the girl a chance. It ain't a square deal to go aching round about this onless there's some real evidence. If Jas Stark claims to have anything up his sleeve let him play the card."

"You're d—n whistlin'!" Wilson turned amiably on Simp, his smile robbing the words of their sting. "Why, you durned old toughfoot, where did you head in from. You claim yore name's Simp Shell. Maybe at that it is. We ain't askin' questions about what yore oncet name is. We're givin' you the benefit of the doubt, old-timer. Not even inquirin' what penitentiary you registered at, if any."

Simp sputtered. "See here, boy, tha's fightin' talk if you only knew it."

Wilson's grin was friendly and disarming. "I don't really reckon they got the goods on you enough to put you behind bars. Likely you were too smooth to get caught. My point is that it ain't a man-size job to sit here on yore roosts gabbling about one poor woman who has had the cards stacked against her in this game of life."

"You make yore point stick out like a sore thumb, Wils," Quinn admitted without rancor. "An' before you begin on my pedigree I moves this gossips' aid society stands adjourned."

The motion appeared to be carried. Lyn passed into the post office, but Wilson stayed to talk of cattle and water holes and the fall round-up. He felt awkward and ashamed at his defense of the weak, as though he had been advertising his virtue. In this cynical old world no man likes to be caught doing good.

Pelicans Had Been Too Long Fishermen's Pets

A discovery was made a short time ago, says the Detroit News, that many pelicans in Santa Monica bay, Calif., have never learned to fish for their daily subsistence. For years the pouch-billed water birds have dozed sleepily around the wharves and fishing vessels and lived entirely upon the fish proffered them by generous fishermen.

It was not necessary for these birds to skim the waves of the sea in pursuit of schools of fish and make the beautiful dives so attractive to observers; thus they never learned the art. But a condition occurred that almost spelled finis for such a languorous mode of living.

Rough seas drove the fish to quieter and deeper waters. Fishermen failed to make the usual catches and there was less food to toss to the birds. Some cases were found where birds had almost starved to death. That the condition was caused by a lack of schooling is proved by the fact that scores of regular birds found no difficulty in doing plenty of their own fishing.

Liked Sound of Bell

Earl Tillotson, Woodland (Calif.) service station operator, had every reason to believe the depression was all over. When he opened the station the other morning the cash register showed that $2,162,000 in sales had been made during the night. Then he discovered that a pet kinkajou, kept in the building, had escaped from his cage and that the cash register, with its clanging bell, offered the chief amusement.

How One Woman Lost 20 Pounds of Fat

Lost Her Prominent Hips—Double Chin—Sluggishness

Gained Physical Vigor—A Shapely Figure

If you're fat—first remove the cause!

Take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water in the morning. To hasten results go light on fatty meats, potatoes, cream and pastries—in 3 weeks get on the scales and note how many pounds of fat have vanished.

Notice also that you have gained in energy—your skin is clearer—you feel younger in body—Kruschen will give any fat person a joyous surprise.

But be sure it's Kruschen—your health comes first—and SAFETY first is the Kruschen promise.

Get a bottle of Kruschen Salts from any leading druggist anywhere in America (lasts 4 weeks) and the cost is but a trifle.

Transformation

The teacher had sent some of the clay dishes the children had made to the pottery works to be baked. When they were returned she placed them on a table with several other dishes which had not been baked.

Robert was the first child to notice the dishes and running to the teacher he said:

"Oh, Miss ——, look, some of our dishes turned to glass last night!"

He Pays With 240 Pennies

C. W. (Paddy) Johnston arrived one minute late at the weighing-in room just before a horse race in the Isle of Man. Told that he would be fined $5, no more or no less, even if he were an hour late, Johnston went to the local bank and within an hour returned and paid his fine with 240 pennies, each equivalent to about 2 cents in American money.

Toy Balloon Romance

A toy balloon released near a German soldier's grave in a Cologne cemetery, came to earth on the spot in France where the man was fatally wounded in the war. A little niece of the dead soldier who visited his grave, bought a toy balloon outside the cemetery gates. She wrote her name and address on it and let it go. The girl has now received a letter from a French workman living in a village near Verdun. He describes the place where his little boy found the balloon. It was the place where the soldier fell.

Interesting Items —of— NORTH DAKOTA

Edmore.—On the opening day of the new creamery at Edmore, held recently, 9,388 pounds of cream were brought into the city by the farmers of this section.

Sheldon.—W. M. Shaw, postmaster at Sheldon, was elected president of the North Dakota Branch of District Postmasters at the annual convention held at Minot.

Hannaford.—Eleven Boy Scouts, together with their scoutmaster, M. N. Holland, and Mr. and Mrs. L. M. Ranes are enjoying a week's outing in the Black Hills of South Dakota.

Tioga.—A wage scale of 15 cents an hour for men and $2.50 per day for man and team was agreed upon as proper for the coming threshing season by farmers and threshers at a meeting here.

Valley City.—Andrew H. Brown, 23, of Leonard, N. Dak., a junior at the state teachers college here, drowned in the Sheyenne river. The body was recovered after being in the water less than 10 minutes.

Williston.—Bids for the construction of a building for the Williston division office of the state highway commission are to be opened at Bismarck, August 12. The building is to be 50 by 140 feet and two stories high.

Minot.—Grand Forks will be the 1933 convention city of three North Dakota postal groups, the postmasters, the rural letter carriers, and the carriers' auxiliary, which ended their convention here recently by electing new officers.

Devils Lake.—Arrangements for the state meeting of the North Dakota Press Association were made at a meeting here of the executive committee members and district officers of the organization. The state convention will be held at Fargo, January 20 and 21.

Fort Yates.—Committees appointed for the 50th anniversary celebration of Standing Rock Indian Reservation, have begun work. Dates for the program are September 1, 2, and 3, in conjunction with the annual reservation fair.

Langdon.—Mrs. Wilson Hunter and Mrs. R. D. Hunter of the East Alma Homemakers club were honored at the third annual achievement day program of the Cavalier county clubs as champion garden makers of Cavalier county.

Killdeer.—When one of her three children riding with her grasped the steering wheel of her car, Mrs. Burdien Kling, car, children and all went in the ditch and rolled over. Only one of the children was injured, but not seriously.

Bismarck.—An advance of nearly $2,000,000 of emergency relief aid funds for highway construction in North Dakota will result in the employment of more than 3,000 men to construct about 500 miles of highway, A. D. McKinnon, chief highway commissioner, announced.

Hatton.—Dividend checks totaling $7,283 were distributed among farmers of the Hatton vicinity at the annual meeting of the Hatton Farmers Elevator company. The amount represents dividends paid stockholders on the 1931 crop, the smallest crop in this section since 1916.

Grafton.—Twelve Grafton boys left for Walhalla, where they are spending the next two weeks at a Boy Scout camp there. The camp is under the direction of Marlin Sieg and Scoutmaster Zimmerman of this city and Harry Pederson, scoutmaster at Walhalla.

Napoleon.—Dedication ceremonies were conducted at Beaver Lake State park, near Burnstad, with horse races, baseball and swimming and picnicking furnishing the program. The park includes about 120 acres of land and it is situated in a 5,000 acre state park and game reserve.

Aneta.—The digging of the city well is going on and is located directly in back of the city auditorium. Drilling of the well was begun about a week ago and reports are that the depth of the well is 100 feet, being encased all the way, according to the statement of the driller.

Buxton.—Fire, believed to have been caused by spontaneous combustion, started in the oil shed at the rear of the H. A. Hong hardware store in Buxton, burning six business places in that village, causing a loss of approximately $50,000, and burned itself out as fire-fighters stood by helpless to save the structures because of inadequate water supply.

Litchville.—Some five thousand farmers met at Stump Lake to further the cause of the "farm strike" which had for its object the setting of the price of wheat at one dollar per bushel. At the close of the program arrangements were made to cooperate with the National Farmers Holiday association, with its headquarters in Des Moines, Iowa.

Devils Lake.—Magnificence and splendor characterized the greatest and most colorful parade ever staged in the City of Devils Lake, presented by the American Legion and Auxiliary convention units, during their recent meeting here. Approximately 50 beautiful floats, drum and bugle corps and bands took part in the spectacular display which attracted a record-breaking crowd to a veritable show, lasting nearly an hour, and which was over a mile long. The 1933 North Dakota convention will be held at Williston.

Merry Christmas

Shortly before the holidays one of those personal tragedies overtook Jack's mother with the result that she had to acquire some artificial teeth. She was sensitive about it, and had told no one outside the family, though, of course, Jack had heard it discussed in the home circle. Imagine his mother's feelings, then, when, the day after Christmas, she heard her son boasting to a neighbor:

"Gee, we had a dandy Christmas this year! We got a new car, and a new radio, and mamma got new teeth!"—Indianapolis News.

USE MUCH MOHAIR IN RAILROAD CARS

Rates as One Fabric to Withstand Wear and Tear of Continuous Service.

PERHAPS you have sometimes wondered why all railway seats are upholstered in the same material, the familiar mohair velvet that in our childhood days was invariably a bright red or green and always of one or two standard patterns. Today even train interiors have become color-conscious and soft greens and taupes and warm blues are seen but are still of the same mohair velvet to the extent, it has been estimated, of twelve million yards in the trains of the country.

The reason for this is that no other fabric has been found that will stand all the hard wear and tear that 24-hour service means. Made from the fleece of the angora goat, mohair velvet or velmo, is one of the most popular and serviceable of fabric materials. One hundred million yards are in use on automobiles alone and many more on motor busses and for the interiors of airplanes.

In addition to this, velmo is also used for upholstering furniture, for draperies and even for rugs and is especially in favor with the housewife because it is chemically moth-proofed in manufacture. It is also used for theatre curtains and chair coverings, because of the sound absorption the deep pile fabric affords, which is an important consideration in talking picture theatres. Like everything else, mohair velvet has "gone modern" and can be had in an endless variety of colors and patterns and weaves. Over five hundred shades of green alone are reported by one New England mill.

But an upholstering fabric is by no means the only service the mohair fleece renders. The finest indoor golf courses are made of a rich, deep pile mohair velvet. Lap robes and steamer rugs, lifelike stuffed animals, trimmings for house slippers and even wigs and transformations are made from this snowy fleece which more closely resembles human hair than any other known fibre.

Each fibre is much stronger than wool and due to its unique physical structure takes a fadeless dye. Because of its sleek surface, it does not readily retain dust and dirt and, in fact, the pile surface acts as a brush and makes the traveler's clothing actually cleaner at the end of the trip than it was before!

So great has the demand been for this fleece that within a comparatively few years, the industry of angora goat raising has been transferred from Turkey and South Africa to the United States, which now leads the world both in the production and manufacture of mohair fleece.

MOTHS WILL DIE RATHER THAN EAT TREATED MOHAIR

AT LAST science is making headway against the moth, that harmless looking little insect that causes damage to household effects to the tune of $400,000,000 annually. In regard to at least one important fabric, mohair velvet, victory has been achieved.

All fabrics made from animal fiber, which is largely protein, are normally attractive to moths. Exceptional cleanliness, exposure to sunlight and the use of moth deterrents applied at home are sometimes helpful, but the thorough and scientific way to thwart the enemy is for the material to be permanently mothproofed with chemicals at the mill when it is being made. So successful is this process that mohair velvet, or velmo as the rich pile fabric made from the hair of the angora goat is called, once considered by housewives as the moths' heaven is now recognized as their Waterloo. It has indisputably been proved that moths will starve themselves to death rather than eat mohair velvet that has been so treated. This feature alone, aside from the long-wearing qualities, easy cleaning and luxurious appearance of velmo, recommends it as the ideal fabric for furniture upholstering.

For other furnishings, frequent airing and plenty of sunlight will tend to reduce the breeding haunts of the house moth. Killing the moth on the wing will not do any good as by the time it has reached the flying stage it has already deposited its eggs and is ready for death. It is these eggs or larvae which, hatching out, seize the animal fibers which have not been chemically treated and eat them.

Taxes Are Not Cancelled By the County Board

A great deal of misunderstanding has been occasioned by the publication of the list of uncollected personal property taxes in the issue of the News on the 5th of August. The impression seems to be that the County Board has cancelled all the taxes listed. However if one will read the entire heading carefully, he will find after the long list is another short list of two names, which are the only ones whose taxes were cancelled, and which aggregates $4.51. This explanation should correct the erroneous idea that a great many people are avoiding the payment of the personal property taxes by having them cancelled by the County Board.

The county board will use the law in collecting the outstanding personal property taxes if, those who owe them do not pay up in due time.

Ordahl Family Visiting Here

Rev. and Mrs. M. B. Ordahl and three of their children from Binford, N. Dak., are visiting with friends here this week.

Rev. Ordahl who was one of the pioneers in church work in this country and who was the pastor in the Nazareth Lutheran church here for about 20 years, will deliver the English sermon here at 11 o'clock Sunday morning.

Mr. and Mrs. Orris Larson of Bathgate, N. Dak., spent Sunday here at the home of Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Larson.

Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Nohre, Miss Clara Ellestad and F. K. Fredrickson motored to Fergus Falls on Sunday to see Carl Ellestad who is at the state detention hospital there. Mrs. Nohre and Miss Ellestad left from that city for Spring Grove by train the same day.

First Grain Taken In Here

The first new grain for the 1932 season was bought here last week by Olaf Ness who is manager at the Math Barzen Cooperative Elevator Company elevator. The first farmers to bring in the new grain were: Pete Klungness who sold some flax and Math Lunke who sold some wheat. Both the farmers had good clean grain and reported that they had an average yield.

The farmers up in Ringbo enjoyed a big rain late Monday nite. Everything here is now dried out and rain is needed so that the farmers will get some water in the wells for their livestock.

Butter, Oleo, and Taxes

Friends of oleo who feel that special taxes imposed on it are unfair seem to forget that butterfat is also taxed, and taxed plenty. B. G. Rogers, of California, where oleo people are trying to do away with a 15 cent tax, says that "their claim of discrimination against oleo because there is no tax on butter won't hold water. The tax on the dairy herd, on the buildings, land and machinery used in the production of milk, as well as trucks for transportation and manufacturing plants and other property connected with the production and manufacture of butter constitutes a tax on butter which will exceed 15 cents a pound.

"Therefore this tax of 15 cents per pound on oleo is necessary to make that commodity bear its just portion of the burden of state government, since the oleo is manufactured outside the state and a large proportion of the ingredients come from foreign countries, much of it duty-free."

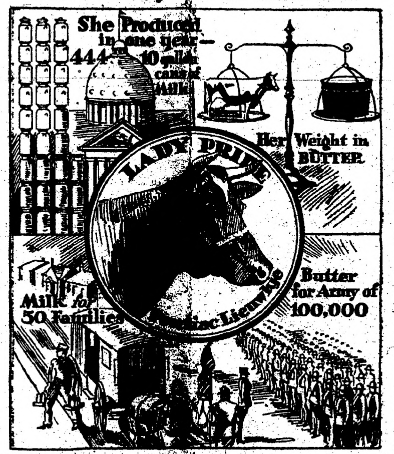
Record Dairy Cow at State Fair



She Produced in one year—444 10 gallon cans of Milk
Her Weight in BUTTER
LADY PRIDE Pontiac Lieuwkje
Milk for 50 Families
Butter for Army of 100,000

The world's greatest dairy cow will be exhibited at the Minnesota State Fair and Northwest Livestock Show, September 3 to 10.

She is Lady Pride Pontiac Lieuwkje, of Femco Farms, Breckenridge, Minn., owned by F. E. Murphy, of Minneapolis. She completed on July 3 an all-time combination record for milk and butter production. In one year Lady Pride produced 35,626 pounds of milk and 1,483 pounds of butter—more than any other cow in history.

This vast mount of milk, if put in ten-gallon cans, would fill 444 containers, which if placed one on top of the other, would make a column 888 feet high, or three and one-third times the height of the State Capitol dome. This volume of lacteal fluid would supply fifty families with one quart of milk each day for an entire year.

During the test period Lady Pride matched her weight in butter—nearly 1,500 pounds. This would furnish an army of 100,000 men with a pat of butter at one meal.

Injured In Fall

Mrs. John Hagberg met with a serious accident at her home here on Saturday evening when somehow she fell headfirst thru a trap door into the basement and fractured her skull. She was at once rushed to the St. Lukes hospital at Thief River Falls and given treatment but up to the time of this writing she has not gained conciousness.

The doctors are holding out hope that she will come out of the coma she is in and soon recover.

E. O. Nybakken arrived here this week to take up his duties as superintendent of our school. It is planned to start school Tuesday, September 6.

Mrs. H. O. Hanson and Mrs. Ole Hanson visited at the A. B. Anderson home on Friday.

Guy Anderson, regular mail carrier on the rural route out of here is taking his annual summer vacation. Alfred Anderson is making the daily trip around the route in his place.

Lutheran Harvest Festival Postponed

The Nazareth Lutheran church Harvest Festival which was announced for Sunday, August 28, has been postponed on account of the same date having been selected for a Harvest Festival by one of the other church organizations in the community.

The Harvest Festival here will be held at the F. K. Fredrickson home on the C. L. Heinze farm a half mile north of town on Sunday, Sept. 4.

Complete program will be published next week. Remember the date and tell all your friends about it. SEPT. 4.

All members present.

Minutes of meeting held June 6 stand approved as read.

Moved by Nohre, seconded by Ness that R. A. Werner be elected chairman of the board for next year. Motion carried.

Moved by Nohre, seconded by Ness that C. L. Sandberg be elected vice-chairman. Carried.

Moved by Ness and seconded by Nohre that G. Sanoden be elected clerk. Motion carried.

Moved by Sandberg and seconded by Nohre that Geo. Fricker be elected treasurer. Carried.

Moved and seconded that he furnish Security Bond for $3000, the district to pay for the bond. Motion carried.

The following bill was allowed:
Interstate Power Co. $1.00

Moved by Sanoden, seconded by Ness that we hire Joe Nelson as janitor for 10 months, salary $60.00 per month. Motion carried.

Moved by Fricker and seconded by Nohre that we levy $9,000 for next year. Motion carried.

This is $1,000 less than previous years.

The clerk was instructed to advertise for bids on three Bus Routes, bids to be in by Aug. 15.

Moved, seconded, and carried that the meeting be adjourned.

G. Sanoden, Clerk

Minutes of special meeting held August 15, 1932:

Moved by Nohre, seconded by Sanoden that Nils Ness be given contract for Route 1 at $38.00 per month. Motion carried.

Moved by Nohre and seconded by Sanoden that Nils Johnson be given contract for Route 2 at $24.50 per month. Motion carried.

All bids on Route 3 were rejected as the Route had to be changed to go out to Ludwig Sagstuen.

Christ A. Saastad was low bidder on old routing and was also low bidder on new routing. He was given contract on Route 3 at $29.00 per month.

Moved, seconded, and carried that meeting be adjourned.

Band Played at St. Hilaire

The Holt 30-Piece Community Band motored to St. Hilaire on Tuesday evening and gave the people of that community a musical concert. The Holt Male Quartett also sang.

Several auto loads of people from here also drove down to hear the boys play and from the sound of all the applause they got, we know the St. Hilaire people enjoyed the concert.

The Commercial Club down there set the band boys up to a big lunch and everybody had a good time.

Gatzke Man Drowned

Einer Westberg, 23 years old, resident of Gatzke, Minnesota, drowned in Maple Lake about 9 p. m. Monday evening as he was attempting to swim to a raft. When within ten feet of the raft he called for help and went down. His body was recovered in about ten minutes by Virginia Betty Harding of Crookston who with others was swimming near the scene, but efforts to revive him failed.

Mrs. Iver Engebretson left this week for Duluth to spend several weeks at the homes of her two daughters there.

Band Rehearsal

Band rehearsal Tuesday evening at 8 p. m., at the bandstand.

New Form of Power for Use on Farms Is Tested

Experiments in the use of diesel tractors on the farm are being conducted on the old J. J. Hill farm at Humboldt, Minn., in the northwestern corner of Kittson county, where plowing of 10,000 acres of land with one diesel catterpillar tractor pulling 16 plow bottoms has been started this week.

Prof. H. H. McColly, head of the agricultural engineering department of the North Dakota Agricultural college is conducting fuel and tractor farming tests and other engineers from Minnesota, South Dakota and Manitoba Agricultural colleges are co-operating. Several oil companies are assisting by furnishing diesel fuel data.

The experiment is the first in the Northwest with diesel engines furnishing the power and a careful check is being kept on the operations. Running two shifts a day, two operators are plowing about 150 acres a day. The 10,000 acre plowing job is expected to take about 65 days of continuous plowing.

SYNOPSIS

Wilson McCann, young Arizona ranchman, finds an old friend, Jim Yerby, with a broken leg. Julia Stark, daughter of Matthew Stark, inveterate enemy of the McCanns, is with him. Jasper, Julia's brother, attempts to assassinate Wilson. Ann Gifford, with her young sister, Ethel, are sheep raisers, and on that account unpopular with the cattlemen. "Night riders" shoot a McCann rider. Peter McCann, Wilson's father, offers a reward for the disclosure of their identity. Wilson McCann horsewhips Jasper, he making practically no resistance. Matthew Stark posts notice he will kill Wilson McCann on sight. Ann Gifford's tragedy is the fate of her dead sister, Nora, betrayed and abandoned by her lover. Jasper Stark and Carl Gitner, known as a "killer," hold secret conferences. A Stark rider, Tom McArdle, is believed by the Starks to have been killed by the McCanns, but rumor links his name with that of Nora Gifford. Matthew Stark is killed, from ambush. Julia finds him dead, with Wilson McCann stooping over him. She and Phil, her younger brother, accuse McCann of the killing, despite his vehement denial. Wilson is shot from the chapparal, while standing over Matthew Stark's body. Believing him dying, the Starks have him taken to their home. Dave Stone, Stark rider, a Texan with a record as a "killer," openly doubts Wilson's guilt. Jasper is disinherited by his father's will. Wilson McCann is restored to health. Jasper Stark, despite the girl's aversion, seeks to persuade Ethel Gifford to marry him, holding over her the threat of revealing Ann as the slayer of Tom McArdle. Ann drives him from the ranch, defying him. Later she admits to Ethel that she killed McArdle, Nora's betrayer. No action as to Matthew Stark's killing is taken. An anonymous letter to the sheriff charges Ann Gifford with McArdle's murder.

CHAPTER VIII

—9—

A Quiet Man Talks

Stone had killed a white-tailed buck in the foothills of the Sierras. Phil was with him, and Julia. All three of them had left the ranch in the early morning.

They were homeward bound now, with night impending. In the valley darkness was beginning to fall, but long shafts of golden glow still ran along the mountain ridges and bathed their rocky slopes in splendor. To Julia the desert always symbolized itself in terms of life. She saw the flash of teeth in its eternal conflict. This little man riding beside her, so lean and sinewy and dangerous, so effective in meeting the conditions it demanded to endure, was a reflection of its gaunt persistence.

All day Phil had been preoccupied with an anxiety that now found words.

"I'm worried some, Sis. At Mesa yesterday I heard gossip." He stopped, then added: "About Ann Gifford."

The Texan riding beside him gave by no outward action any sign of interest, but somehow Phil knew that he was intent on catching every word.

"They say she shot Tom McArdle."

Julia flashed an indignant retort. "How outrageous! And senseless! What object could she possibly have?"

"They say—her sister Nora."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, that Tom was responsible."

"Oh!" The girl fell silent, her thoughts busy knitting together loose ends of gossip she had heard.

"Who says so?" she demanded.

The boy hesitated. He could talk freely before Stone, for hard and tough though the Texan was, an accredited killer, both these young people sensed in him the same loyalty that bound them to Dominick Rafferty.

"Jas, for one," Phil gulped out.

"Jas!" Julia pulled up her horse abruptly. "What does he know about it?"

"Claims he practically saw her do it, him an' Gitner."

Stone spoke for the first time. "Where'd you hear this, Phil?"

"In town. Everybody knows it. They say when Hank Le Page went out to her place she wouldn't even deny it—jus' told him to prove it if he could."

"But Jas—I don't understand. If he saw her do it, or felt sure she had done it, why did he wait nearly three months to tell it? Why didn't he tell it then, or not at all?" Julia asked.

"I don't know," Phil answered. "But what worries me is that the story is liable to be true. She might a-done it. She's thataway."

Out of the night came the Texan's low drawl. "You needn't to worry none, boy. She didn't do it."

"You think she didn't?" Phil turned with relief to Stone.

"I don't think. I know."

Julia turned white. "You don't mean that—Jas did it?"

"No."

"But you know who did?"

"I sure do."

"And you'll tell?"

"Yes, ma'am. I was tryin' to shield him, for Tom McArdle certainly needed killin'. But now that Miss Gifford's name has been brought into it I reckon he'll have to stand the gaff."

Both of the young Starks wanted to ask him who had done it. More than once the question almost passed Julia's lips. But there was something in the little man's manner that restrained her. If he wanted her to know he would tell her.

"Well, I'm glad Ann Gifford didn't do it," she said. "The poor girl's had enough trouble. If she wasn't so stiff with me—if she'd only meet me a quarter of the way—I'd ride over tomorrow and see her, just to show her we believe in her."

"I'd do that anyway," the Texan said. "It would be right kind of you. She sure needs a woman friend. Old Jim Yerby is about the only one she neighbors with a-tall."

"Will you go with me?" Julia asked Stone. "You used to know her."

"I'll go with you if I'm footloose," he promised, rather evasively.

She laughed. "I believe you're afraid to go."

"Tha's no josh, Miss Julia. Ladies scare me."

"Some ladies," she corrected. "I notice I don't scare you any."

Snatches of thought began to race in the girl's brain. Usually when a man was afraid of a woman, unless he was her husband and had given offense to her, it was because he was attracted to her. She had observed a painful shyness on the part of the youths about her as a symptom of suppressed emotion. It was an unconscious warning they flung out to Julia to trim the sails of her manner to them. This Texan would not exhibit any awkward bashfulness. He was too self-contained, too much master of every nerve and muscle. None the less he might, within, be as much disturbed as they were. Why shouldn't he be in love with Ann Gifford? She guessed his age about forty, and in a man that is still young.

He had walked dangerous trails, had done dreadful things if rumors were true. But she knew instinctively that there still burned in him that dynamic spark of self-respect which justified him to himself. He had his standards, and he played the game by them. She had no more doubt of this than she had that such a man as Gitner had no standards.

Ann Gifford needed some one to take from her shoulder the heavy burden life had laid upon them. Stone was such a man, strong, quiet, self-reliant. He was dangerous to his foes, but it came to Julia with a flash of clairvoyance that the very qualities that had made his name notorious would be a sure protection to a woman like Ann.

* * * * * * *

Stone rode up to the office of Hank Le Page, sheriff, swung from the saddle, and dropped the bridle reins.

Le Page looked up from the ledger in which he was laboriously entering some items of expense. "'Lo, Dave. How's everything?"

"Fine an' dandy."

The Texan found a chair, a cigarette, and a match.

For five minutes there was silence except for the scratching of the sheriff's pen and the gruntings with which he accompanied the manual labor of bookkeeping. Then, with a sigh of relief, the official closed the heavy volume.

"Anything new, Dave?" he asked, relaxing.

"Not a thing with me. Hear you've hit a new trail in the McArdle case."

"Looks thataway. Some of you Circle Cross boys tipped me off that the Gifford girl was seen makin' a getaway from the place where Tom was shot. I went out to see her about it. She acted mighty funny."

"How?"

"Oh, kinda defiant. The li'l sister broke down an' cried. I couldn't get a thing outa her, either."

"So you reckon Miss Ann did it?"

"Wouldn't it look that way? Tom McArdle had made his brags about the other sister. That was known. She'd warned him off the place, Ann had. Say they meet by chance an' quarrel. She's got a temper. Well, say it ripped loose an' she shot him."

"Looks reasonable. Only trouble is, it ain't true."

"Think she didn't do it?"

And again Stone gave the answer he had given Phil. "I ain't thinkin'. I know."

The sheriff lost his manner o' casual ease.

"Did you say you knew? How do you know?"

"Saw him do it."

"Who?"

"I'm allowin' to tell you who—presently."

"Hmp!" The sheriff looked at him, not without resentment. "You've waited three months to tell me. Reckon I can wait another five minutes."

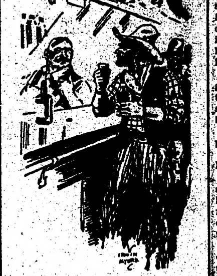
"Sure. Fact is, I didn't aim to tell you a-tall. But when I found out there was talk about Miss Ann—why, tha's different. Might as well begin at the start. I usta hang around the sheep ranch some my own self. Knew old Gifford when he lived at Santone, so I drifted in oncet in a while to advise Miss Ann. I got kinda suspicious of McArdle. He was one of these black-mustached lady-killers, good lookin' an' glib with his tongue. Nora was a mighty nice li'l lady an' I could see she had took a great fancy to him. What I was worried about was that she'd marry him, but that wasn't what happened. If I'd known what I knew later, that McArdle had a wife living at Prescott, well I'd sure have sat in an' took a hand."

Le Page nodded. The Texan looked away dreamily and blew smoke wreaths. Presently he took up again his story.

"After Miss Ann came back from Los Angeles she wouldn't have any of us around. On top of the trouble about her sister some durn fools had killed a bunch of her sheep. So she jus' swept us all out. Tom had been ridin' in to Tucson to see Ethel whilst she was at school an' he tried goin' to the ranch. Wish I'd been there when he showed up, but I wasn't. Anyhow, Miss Ann gave him the gate. For that matter, the li'l sister was plumb through with him when she found out what he'd done."

"You're makin' a long story of it, Dave."

"I'm comin' to business now. The mornin' Tom was killed four of us from the Circle Cross had a camp near the foot of Round Top. There was Tom an' Jas an' Gitner an' myself. We separated to pick up a bunch of vacas to drive back to the ranch. Long about sun-up I heard a shot right close to me, over to the left where Tom was. I rode thataway an' met Tom. He was laughing fit to kill an' right away began to tell me the joke. He'd just seen Miss Ann an' been devilin' her again. I didn't say a word but listened to him dig his grave with his tongue. What tickled him so much was that he'd riled her so that she'd shot at him an' he'd pretended to fall from his horse over a dugway like he was dead. I asked him what he'd said to make her so mad. He'd told her he was coming up to the ranch to see her li'l sister."



"I Reckon the Celebration Will Be Later," the Man in the Apron Said Significantly.

The Texan stopped. He looked out of the open door at a freight outfit coming down the dusty street. The mule skinner was using raucous and explosive language. Dave Stone did not see him except automatically. Another picture filled his vision.

"The Gifford woman shot at him an' missed," the sheriff prompted.

"Like I done told you. I said to him, 'You don't really figure on going back up to the sheep ranch after what you've done?' He come back at me right quick, that he sure did. I taken a hand there an' then. I said he had another guess comin', that I wouldn't stand for it. He got mad an' wanted to know what business it was of mine. Then he began to lay the blame on what had happened on that li'l girl lying in her grave out in California. I told him what he was an' gave him first chance to draw. His gun was in the open when I killed him. It was me or him an' I beat him to it."

"Jas Stark and Gitner didn't know you did it?"

"No. I couldn't prove it was a fair fight, so I rode back into the chaparral when I heard them comin'. Pretty soon I showed up an' they began to tell me how Miss Ann had shot McArdle. I'd a-told them how it was but I saw Jas was all for hushin' it up that she'd killed him, so I jus' told the boys I didn't believe she'd done it an' let it go at that."

The sheriff reflected. "I'll have to lock you up, Dave."

"Sure. But I've told you the straight of it. Would you mind sendin' some one out to the Gifford place to tell the young ladies that it's all right far as they're concerned?"

"I'll send some one soon as I can."

"Better jus' put it that we quarreled an' I killed him. No use worryin' them with what I told you. I wanted you to know the facts, but there's no need of spreading 'em broadcast."

The sheriff assented.

A puncher riding the grub line passed the Circle Cross and stopped at the bunkhouse.

"I would of liked to a-got home, but I reckon I'll kick in here tonight," he told himself plaintively.

Jasper came to the doorway. "'Lo, Bud! Light an' look at yore saddle," he invited.

"I'd orta be pushin' on my reins," the puncher demurred. "My wife'll sure give me a cussin' when I git home. She knows I quit the Open AB three days ago, because old Caldwell was in town an' seen me there. I had hard luck in Mesa. It's sure enough one high-tariff town."

His predicament pleased Jasper. He guessed that Bud had been "given his time" at the Open AB and had dissipated his check in drink and gambling.

"Did you get nicked at Pedro's place?"

"For forty plunks, in a stud game. My luck's something scand'lous."

The rider dropped from the saddle and came into the bunkhouse. After he had taken a couple of drinks he forgot the story he meant to tell about quitting his job because he didn't like the foreman.

"I'm sore as a toad on a skillet," he explained confidentially. "Me, I'm a top-hand with a rope. You know that, Jas. I aim to hold up my end always. Course I can get plenty of jobs. That ain't it. 'Lo, Carl."

Gitner had drifted into the room and seated himself at the table. "Anything new in town?" he asked.

"Why no, I reckon not. Except about Dave Stone."

"What about him?"

Both of the cowpuncher's hosts had become instantly intent, but he failed to notice it.

"Why, he's been arrested for killin' Tom McArdle. He rode in today an' confessed to Hank Le Page that he done it. They had some kind of a row an' he plugged Tom."

Jasper drove a clenched fist down on the table. "He's lyin', to get that Gifford girl out of it. Why, he couldn't a-done it. We practically caught her."

The eyes of Gitner met those of Stark. A sly and furtive cunning filled them. The germ of an idea was filtering into that brutalized brain.

"I dunno, Jas. Maybe he could. There was somethin' funny about the way he looked when he come outa that manzanita gulch, come to think of it. He didn't really act surprised when he saw Tom lyin' there. He played like he was, seems to me. O' course if he waylaid Tom from the brush—"

Jasper started. The idea and its possibilities had come home to him. If it could be made to appear that Stone had shot Tom McArdle without giving him a chance for his life the Texan could be got rid of quickly. It was a country of swift action. Stone's reputation as a "bad man" would tell against him. Sentiment could be worked up. He had delivered himself into their hands.

If Jasper had not been thoroughly frightened he would not have jumped so eagerly at Gitner's suggestion. But he quaked like the coward he was at thought of what the little man knew. The terror of it walked with him day and night. Stone was dangerous, a ruthless tool of Nemesis dogging his footsteps to destroy him. He had followed Gitner's logic, that the only safety for them lay in putting an end to the man.

Now a way had opened, without danger, with no possible comeback. If Mesa rose up and lynched the murderer of Tom McArdle he could not be blamed in any way.

"Let's go to town, Carl," he proposed. "We gotta find just how things lay."

"Reckon I'll go back with you, boys," Bud said.

The three rode there together. They dismounted in front of Pedro's place. Gitner led the way to the bar. "Free drinks on me today, boys. Everybody welcome. Set 'em up, Pedro."

The process of working up public sentiment for a lynching had begun.

CHAPTER IX

Ann Rides to Mesa

In town with a pack horse for supplies, Jim Yerby stopped at the Gilt Edge saloon to get a bottle of snakebite medicine. The old-timer admitted that he never had been struck by a rattler but you never could tell when your luck would turn bad. He took the cure in advance to forestall the evil day.

While Yerby talked to the bartender his quick beady eyes darted round the room on voyages of discovery. Something was in the air, something that caused unwonted excitement. The patrons of the place were gathered together in knots, and at the heart of each group a man was talking in a low urgent voice. Jasper Stark was one of the murmuring orators. Another was Carl Gitner.

The bartender took Yerby's money for the bottle of liquor he bought but pushed back the quarter proffered for the drink.

"It's on some of the boys today," he explained.

"A li'l celebratin'?" asked the nester with lifted eyebrows.

"I reckon the celebratin' will be later," the man in the apron said significantly.

Yerby sauntered to the outskirts of the nearest group. It was the one in the center of which Jasper Stark sawed the air.

"You say he was our friend when he did it," Jasper was repeating, in a voice dry as a whisper. "Leave it lay at that. Say he was. So was Tom. But that ain't the point. I wouldn't make no holler if he'd plugged Tom fair an' square in the open. No, gents. I'd go through from h—l to breakfast for him. You're d—n whistling I would. If it had a-been thataway. Which it wasn't. Like I been tellin' you, this Texas killer an' Tom had quarreled. Stone told Car' an' he told me that he would sure get Tom. When we saw the Gifford woman lighting out so sudden we figured naturally that she'd done it. All the same, both Carl an' I thought Stone acted mighty funny when he came outa the brush an' found us beside Tom's body. He played like he was surprised, an' it didn't get acrost to us. We suspicioned somehow he knew more'n he said. Maybe he was in cahoots with Ann Gifford."

Yerby spoke up promptly. "Not on yore tintype. Miss Ann hadn't a thing to do with this. She's a right nice young lady."

Bleaky Jasper looked at him. "Sorry if I hurt yore feelings by naming yore sheepherding friends, Yerby," he sneered. "But leave that go. Say Stone played a lone hand. Question is: Can a Texas killer come in here an' shoot down our boys from the brush an' get away with it? I'll gamble on it he can't."

"Meanin'?" asked Yerby.

"Meanin' that the boys aim to take a hand pronto."

The nester knew the crowd had been drinking. He had met before the lust to kill that makes a mob cruel and inhuman. For some reason, he saw at once, young Stark was working up the men of Mesa to an act of summary vengeance.

"Hold yore hawsses, Jas. I'd like right well to hear Stone's story before you get rampageous. He's a killer, I reckon. Leastways he's got that rep. But he don't look to me like one of the kind that shoots you whilst he's shakin' hands with you. No sense in going off half cocked."

"What's eatin' you, Yerby? This Stone has confessed he did it," Jasper interrupted rudely.

"Has he confessed he shot Tom from the brush?"

The sly and shifty eyes of the younger man met those of the old-timer and slid away. "Not necessary. The facts show it. Carl an' I were the first folks on the ground. Tom hadn't fired a shot. The coward that shot him never gave him a chance."

"When you tell that to a jury—"

Explosion of Krakatoa Believed to Be Record

The greatest explosion which the world has ever known took place in 1883 when the volcano, Krakatoa, located in the Sunda strait between Java and Sumatra, blew up. "At that time a huge crater stood there, with a rim of islands 2,600 feet above the sea," writes Charles Baker, Jr., in Boys' Life, the monthly publication of the Boy Scouts of America. "The whole cluster of islands were blown into bits, leaving a hole in the sea 1,000 feet deep; 3,600 vertical feet of rock were thrown aside.

"These explosions were caused by steam from sea water in the throat of the new crater meeting the first of the molten lava," continues Mr. Baker. "After the first explosions, water probably chilled the lava to a crust, enclosing enormous quantities of steam within. This finally burst through the chilled crust in the most violent explosion, hurling a vast mass of cool lava, pumice and dust into the air. The sound of the explosion was heard 3,000 miles away. Never before or since have sound waves carried so far on earth. Long tidal waves 50 feet high reached Cape Horn, South America, 7,818 miles away. Thirty-six thousand people were killed. Thousands of ships were destroyed or carried high and dry, far inland."

Sensible Speaker

A good story is told of Edmund Burke, the celebrated English orator and friend of America. A colleague of Burke's, rather a poor speaker, was called upon to speak immediately after Burke had made one of his best speeches. Rising to his feet, he said, "I say ditto to Mr. Burke—I say ditto to Mr. Burke," and sat down.

Famous Irish Race Course

The word "curragh" derives from the Gaelic cuirrech. Cuirrech means race course and also low-lying or marshy ground. The double meaning is understandable in that flat land would naturally be selected for a race course. The Curragh of Kildare is one of the most famous race courses in the world. Beside the River Liffey, near Dublin, it is the scene of the Irish derby and many other famous races. Also, the great Dublin horse fair is held there annually. In the Tenth century the king of Leinster granted the Curragh of Kildare, which embraces some 4,800 acres, to St. Bridget, who gave it to the people as a common. For 1,000 years it has been preserved as open land.

Life-Insurance Protection

Life insurance premiums in the United States absorb 4 per cent of the total national income, according to an article by Mary Dublin reviewed in Social Science Abstracts. At the close of 1929 there was $113,000,000,000 of life insurance in force in this country, which was almost three times that carried in all other countries in the world. Though most persons who carry insurance are inadequately insured, it is pointed out, protection is much more general among the upper income groups than among the wage-earning population.

Cost Her $4.25 To Reduce 65 Pounds

"Worth It," Miss Bates Says

If you're young and fat read what Miss Bates of Beech, Iowa, has to say about Kruschen Salts—if you are middle age or old Kruschen shows you the way to lose fat the SAFE way.

"I took one bottle of Kruschen Salts a month for five months. It amounted to $4.25 and I reduced 65 lbs. but it was worth it. Imagine just 22 years old and weighing what I did. I could not enjoy myself as other girls did. I could not get the clothes I wanted. I think it is wonderful the results Kruschen Salts give."

To lose fat the safe, sane way—take one-half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water before breakfast every morning—eat less fatty meats, potatoes and sweets—a jar that costs but a small sum lasts 4 weeks. Get it at any drugstore in the world—but be sure for your health's sake to ask for and get Kruschen Salts. It's the little daily dose that does it.

Parliamentary Rule

When a motion is laid on the table, the expression is figurative. A record is made of this motion in the minutes and simply means that the matter has been laid aside for the present, its consideration to be resumed when a motion is made to that effect or opportunity offers.

More Aliens Leaving Than Entering U. S.

Change in Immigration Tide Laid to Depression.

New York.—America has just about ceased to be the land of opportunity to the European peasant and unskilled laborer if immigration figures on record at Ellis island can be accepted as a criterion.

The influx of aliens is diminishing week by week. During the fiscal year ended June 30 the total of immigrants admitted at this port from all foreign countries fell to 116,765—approximately. This is only a little more than one-third of the total of entries for the fiscal year of 1929-1930, which was recorded at 302,304.

On the other hand the number of aliens leaving these shores for their homelands is increasing steadily. During the twelve-month period which has just come to a close some 184,680 of them filed through Ellis islands on their way back to the "old countries" as compared with a corresponding total of 170,412 for the fiscal year which closed June 30, 1930.

Old Man Depression is to blame—or be credited. With mills and factories closing down, or running on reduced schedules throughout the country, building operations coming to a standstill and farmers unable to hire help, the alien within our gates is finding it more and more difficult to find employment—even by undercutting the native-born worker. In many places, too, preference is give to America's own needy in the distribution of relief funds—another thing which makes it difficult for the sojourning immigrant to understand this land of ours. At least that is the way the immigration officials size up the situation.

The immigration tide began to turn outward early last year. Between January 1 and the end of June of that year the departures outnumbered arrivals in the country by 9,348. Figures for July, August and September materially increased the excess. The peak of the overflow was reached in May when a total of 8,577 aliens departed voluntarily to the lands whence they came and when another 1,597 who had been found undesirable for one reason or another were forcibly deported. During the same month the total of incoming immigrants amounted to only 2,479 admitted for permanent residence for all ports of the country.

This compared with an average of 3,051 monthly for the preceding ten months of the fiscal year. The May total was 69.4 per cent below the monthly average of 8,095 for the last fiscal year, 87.7 per cent below the monthly average for 1930 and 89.4 per cent below the average for the fiscal year 1929—the figures dealing in each case with immigrants officially classified as aliens defined for purposes of the record as immigrants who announce their intention of making their homes here.

The department's figures show that immigration as a whole and for the entire country has declined 90.3 per cent since three years ago when the influx from all sources except Mexico was practically normal. The proportionate decrease was larger in some cases, particularly for the Irish Free State, Scandinavian countries, Germany and Great Britain, while that for Italy was 68.5 per cent and for Asia only 50.2 per cent.

Immigration officials up to a year or so ago were inclined to give credit to the diminishing immigration tide to a strict enforcement of the immigration quotas laws. Under a policy laid down by President Hoover in September, 1930, consular offices began withholding visas from applicants who might become public charges upon their arrival here and so zealously was this rule carried out that it came to the pass where a majority of aliens admitted for permanent residence were near relatives of American citizens and aliens resident in the United States. This, of course, cut down the influx tremendously.

But it is only in the last 18 months or so that the outflow has begun to gain the balance in volume and the authorities say there is no doubt the depression is primarily to blame.

Bandits "Borrow" $1

Los Angeles.—Arthur O. Bush, taxicab driver, is a creditor. Two bandits have promised to pay him in full—$1.

"Sorry, old man, we had to do this," they told him. "We have to eat. We've got the number of your cab, and we'll pay you back."

Osage Indian Buys Bride for 50 Ponies

Hominy, Okla.—A bride for 50 ponies was "purchased" recently by Thomas Whitehorn, nineteen-year-old Osage Indian, in one of the most elaborate native ceremonies in years here.

The bride, Lucille Matin, like the bridegroom, is descended from a line of Osage chiefs and assistant chiefs. The couple had been married in a Christian wedding a month previous to their native ceremony.

Safety of Cathedral Now Worries British

London.—Many Londoners seem to be in constant fear that St. Paul's cathedral will either crash to earth some day soon or sink away into the ground on which it rests. The newspapers recently have carried long stories about both possibilities.

There is a far more logical basis for the sinking theory than for the more disastrous one. Gigantic St. Paul's (together with most of the city of London) is only cunningly balanced on wet sand with its foundations no deeper at any point that four and a half feet below the crypt floor.

As long as the sand remains wet there is no peril, but during droughts the cathedral already sinks several thousandths of an inch. If the underground springs and streams which keep the sand moist were dammed by excavations for any huge modern buildings nearby St. Paul's then would be doomed.

For the purpose of exploring and charting the streams and lakes which underlie the city, and by this means to establish the exact danger to St. Paul's if any large new building schemes were commenced in the neighborhood the staff of the cathedral has begun digging holes in the floor of the crypt and bore holes will later be sunk at many points within a radius of half a mile of the great church itself. The task will take at least nine months to complete.

First to Send Mail By Air Is Claim

Distinction Belongs to Lafayette, Ind.

Lafayette, Ind.—To Lafayette belongs the distinction of having dispatched the first mail by air, first in all the world.

The epochal events occurred 73 years ago—the exact date being August 17, 1859.

This interesting fact was disclosed here recently by Erick Hildesheim of 8217 Blackstone avenue, Chicago, who came to this country from Denmark recently to write a history of air mail, and who obtained the story of the first air mail from the archives in the congressional library in Washington.

John Wise, best-known American balloonist of his day, was the original air mail carrier. Thomas Wood was postmaster in Lafayette in 1859 when Wise came here for a balloon exhibition.

Wise conceived the idea of carrying mail by balloon and endeavored to interest capital in an improved mail service founded on the idea of ballooning the mail from the west coast to the Atlantic seaboard and from there across the Atlantic ocean by the same means.

The Lafayette air mail plan was devised as an experience in connection with an ascension which Wise had contracted to make here on August 16, 1859. The ascent was a failure on that day and was attempted on the following day with greater success.

An immense crowd gathered as Wise sailed into the air with a bag of mail. Due to lack of wind he was forced to descend near Crawfordsville, 30 miles south of here, but first devised a parachute out of a piece of muslin nine feet square. To this he attached the mail bag and dropped it overboard. He landed in his balloon not far from where the mail bag landed. The mail was then placed aboard a train for the East.

The following dispatch tells the remainder of what is known of the event:

"Lancaster, Pa., Friday, Aug. 20, 1859.—The special letter bag expressed by the postmaster of Lafayette, with proof of Wise's departure, was dropped from the clouds over Crawfordsville, Ind., and passed through here today en route to New York in good condition."

United States in Lead in Air Transportation

Chicago.—Americans, who returned from Europe a few years ago, convinced that the continent surpassed the United States in air transportation, will have to revise that opinion as the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce reports that the United States now has the largest air transport company in the world.

United Air lines is now flying three times as many miles monthly, carrying twice as many passengers and nine times as much mail, as the largest European company, Deutsch Luft Hansa, according to information compiled by the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce, United Air lines' officials were advised. During a thirty-day period United Air lines flew 1,125,000 miles, contrasted with 320,000 miles for Luft Hansa, and carried 8,000 passengers against 4,700 on the European system. United Air lines carried 156 tons of mail, contrasted with sixteen on Luft Hansa.

"Back-to-the-Farm" Movement Becomes a Reality

An experiment which is proving the practicability of a "back-to-the-farm" movement is taking place on a 168 acre tract of land on the outskirts of St. Louis where 445 unemployed men, each the head of a family, are each raising products to supply enough for their dependants and themselves. The project, which is sponsored by the Citizens' Committee on Relief and Employment of St. Louis, makes it possible for every tiller of the soil to raise 21 different varieties of products, using only hand implements.

LOOKING INTO COST OF MEDICAL CARE

Physicians' Committee Soon to Report Findings.

Doctor and hospital bills to the average American family are somber realities. In this healthful country are 200,000,000 cases of illness a year. At any given time, 2 per cent of the population are "laid up." The average American is sick nearly twice a year. Wage-earners lose 250,000,000 working days, or $1,250,000,000 annually, from sickness. Our $3,000,000,000 sick bill falls heaviest upon the self-respecting working and middle classes. The very poor go to free clinics and public hospitals and the rich have means of preventing and curing their ills.

Aside from the fact that preventive health establishments in city and rural communities are inadequate, the American health plant appears to be fairly adequate. We have 1,500,000 health workers and a $3,125,000,000 hospital equipment. The American doctor averages around $5,000 net income, while the big majority of private hospitals operate at a loss. They are modern and efficient, as shown by their ability to conquer such great killers as bubonic plague, malaria, typhus, yellow and typhoid fever and their brave fight on tuberculosis.

Why, then, is this vast health plant unavailable economically to the class that needs it most?

"A substantial portion of the American people have been cut off from the benefits of modern medical art and science because of the costs of medical services," says Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, secretary of the interior. "At the same time, many doctors and other practitioners are not receiving incomes commensurate with their long years of training, and hospitals are facing financial difficulties."

To reconcile this paradox, a committee of physicians, called the committee on the costs of medical care, has been working for five years and will report its findings this fall. In answering the question of how the nation's health facilities can be laid at the door of the average American, we suspect that it will have to go deeply into the fundamentals of our economic system.

Doctor Wilbur says that if our present scientific knowledge and service were equally distributed, it could be "bought" for between $35 to $50 a year per family. And it would add ten years to the average American's life span.—Cleveland Press.

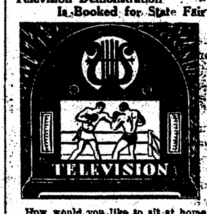
Television Demonstration Is Booked for State Fair



How would you like to sit at home with your radio turned on, listen to the announcer describe a championship fight, and actually see the fight reproduced on a screen in your living room?

Well, that's what television is. And television will be demonstrated for the first time to the public at this year's Minnesota State Fair.

Television has been perfected. Today there are 3,000 sets in Chicago, with programs broadcast daily from the Chicago Daily News Station.

Be sure and see this newest wonder demonstrated at the Fair.

CAMP GROUNDS AT FAIR

Opportunity for a low-cost family vacation is afforded through the use of the free camp ground to be maintained by the management at the Minnesota State Fair and Northwest Livestock Exposition, September 3 to 10.

The free camp ground is under the supervision of the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation with Leland J. Melrose and Mrs. E. V. Ripley in charge. Reservations may be made by writing to them in care of the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation, Old Capitol Building, St. Paul.

Ness-Reierson

The wedding of two local young people occurred Saturday at Thief River Falls when Clara Ness, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Nels N. Ness, became the bride of Oscar Reierson, son of Ole Reierson.

Lawrence Reierson, brother of the groom, and Emma Nelson, cousin of the bride, acted as attendants. Rev. E. L. Tungseth performed the ceremony.

Mr. and Mrs. Reierson will make their home on the Ole Reierson place, where they will engage in farming.

The News joins with the entire community in wishing the young couple the best of luck.

Rainfall and Heat Averages

Records at the Northwest School and Experiment Station for the first four months of the 1932 growing season (April thru July) show the lightest rainfall since 1920, according to E. R. Clark, acting agronomist. The total rainfall during these months amounted to only 6.98 inches, while the average for thirty years was 10.63 inches. In 1926, 7.01 inches of rain fell during these four months. In 1919, the wettest season on record for the corresponding period, 17.28 inches of rainfall occurred.

The present season likewise has been one of the warmest on record. The average temperature for the four months was 60.4 degrees Fahrenheit compared to 57.1 degrees, the thirty-year average. The season of 1921 included the warmest April, May, June and July weather recorded at this station. The average temperature during that period was 61.4.

The local school will open for the 1932-33 term on Tuesday September 6th. The teaching staff remains as last year, all members being retained in their respective positions. The school building has been thoroughly cleaned, repairs having been made where necessary, and is ready for occupancy.

Pupils are urged to enroll on the opening day and continue in regular attendance throughout the year. It is highly desirable that pupils should remain in school as much as possible. If, however, there are some pupils who are unable to attend regularly the first week or two, they should, nevertheless, register on the opening day. Patrons of the school are also cordially invited to visit the local school at any time. Visitors are always welcome.

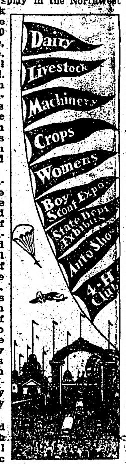
STATE FAIR HAS RECORD EXHIBITS

Lower Production Costs And Increased Consumer Demand is Theme.

Minnesota marches on!

For nearly three-quarters of a century Minnesota's State Fair has presented a clear picture of agricultural progress. Lower production costs and increased consumer demand has been selected as the theme for this year's exposition, September 3 to 10, announces Raymond A. Lee, secretary.

Prizes totaling more than $100,000 have been set aside for educational exhibits. These awards are designed to stimulate activity and progress in all phases of farm life and all lines of agricultural endeavor.



Blue-bloods of the livestock world will be on display in the Northwest Livestock Show. More than 6,000 head of cattle, horses, swine, and sheep will be exhibited. Competition for championship honors will include animals from the best herds and flocks in the United States.

Special attention will be paid to the production and marketing of livestock. Improved and economical methods of feeding will be demonstrated. Meat packers will have an exhibit of fresh meats to show the housewife how cheaper cuts of meat can be used advantageously in the family diet.

Boys' and Girls' 4-H club activities will give a graphic demonstration of just how Minnesota marches on—how the younger generation is preparing to carry on agriculturally. More than 1,300 boys and girls from every county in the state will take part in this interesting and edifying feature. Premiums amounting to $23,585 have been posted for the boys and girls.

Increased consumer demand for dairy products will be stressed in the newly enlarged Dairy Show on the mezzanine floor of the Livestock Pavilion. Among the instructive exhibits shown will be "The Story of a Pound of Butter," which carries the production of a pound of butter from the feeding of the cow to the dinner table. Latest developments in the dairy equipment industry will be on display as a part of the show.

Acres of machinery—not the ordinary equipment, but dynamic, moving displays, enhanced by the fascination of operation—will be presented. Every known piece of farm equipment from the simple hoe to the mammoth combine harvester, will be displayed in the "show window" of the farm equipment industry.

The cream of Minnesota's crops, which include not only corn, grains and grasses, but the products of the vegetable garden, flower plot and orchard as well, will be housed in the Agricultural and Horticultural buildings.

Needlecraft, cooking, preserving—products of the home—will be of especial interest to the women of the state. Here, in the Woman's building, they may exchange ideas and recipes.

A complete Boy Scout Exposition with continuous demonstrations, will be another feature.

Oiling the Highway

The State Highway department are this week oiling the new highway between here and Thief River Falls. Jay W. Craig Company of Minneapolis have the contract to heat and spray the oil on the road bed. The state highway department have their own crews doing the mixing and laying of the oil-tar gravel.

It requires about 15,000 gallons of hot oil-tar to the mile. So far they have sprayed about seven miles and completed the mixing on four miles. According to reports here from the crews, the first six miles will be finished by Saturday night.

The heavy rain on Tuesday evening held up the work on Wednesday as the oil and tar don't mix in wet gravel.

Sad Death of Little One

Lincoln John Horien, the eighteen month old son of Mr. and Mrs. Leo J. Horien, was injured fatally late Tuesday afternoon when he stumbled and fell on a long spouted oil can while playing in the house. He was rushed at once to the St. Luke's hospital at Thief River Falls, where an operation was performed with the hopes of saving the little fellow's life, but it was found that the spout of the oil can had deeply penetrated the brain above the right eye, and very little could be done to prolong his life.

He passed away that same evening at 12 o'clock. The date of his birth was Feb. 12, 1931.

The funeral was held here yesterday afternoon from the Nazareth Lutheran church at one o'clock p. m., Rev. Redal officiating. Interment was made in the village cemetery.

The sympathy of the entire community goes out to the bereaved parents in their hour of sorrow.

SYNOPSIS

Wilson McCann, young Arizona ranchman, finds an old friend, Jim Yerby, with a broken leg. Julia Stark, daughter of Matthew Stark, inveterate enemy of the McCann, is with him. Jasper, Julia's brother, attempts to assassinate Wilson. Ann Gifford, with her young sister, Ethel, are sheep raisers, and on that account unpopular with the cattlemen. "Night riders" shoot a McCann rider. Peter McCann, Wilson's father, offers a reward for the disclosure of their identity. Wilson McCann horsewhips Jasper, he making practically no resistance. Matthew Stark posts notice he will kill Wilson McCann on sight. Ann Gifford's tragedy is the fate of her dead sister, Nora, betrayed and abandoned by her lover. Jasper Stark and Carl Gitner, known as a "killer," hold secret conferences. A Stark rider, Tom McArdle, is believed by the Starks to have been killed by the McCanns, but rumor links his name with that of Nora Gifford. Matthew Stark is killed, from ambush. Julia finds him dead, with Wilson McCann stooping over him. She and Phil, her younger brother, accuse McCann of the killing, despite his vehement denial. Wilson is shot from the chapparal, while standing over Matthew Stark's body. Believing him dying, the Starks have him taken to their home. Dave Stone, Stark rider, a Texan with a record as a "killer," openly doubts Wilson's guilt. Jasper is disinherited by his father's will. Wilson McCann is restored to health. Jasper Stark, despite the girl's aversion, seeks to persuade Ethel Gifford to marry him, holding over her the threat of revealing Ann as the slayer of Tom McArdle. Ann drives him from the ranch. Later she admits to Ethel that she killed McArdle, Nora's betrayer. No action as to Matthew Stark's killing is taken. An anonymous letter to the sheriff charges Ann Gifford with McArdle's murder. Dave Stone, hearing of this, confesses to the sheriff that he killed McArdle, the slaying being the result of McArdle's betrayal of Nora. Stone is confined in the jail at Mesa. Jim Yerby finds Jasper Stark and Gitner urging the lynching of Stone for McArdle's murder.

—10—

"We ain't aimin' to tell it to no jury. We ain't allowin' to let some slick lawyer talk him off. Not none. This town aims to see justice done, to show these bad men who come in an' kill our citizens that we won't stand for it a minute."

The gray-haired little man rubbed his unshaven chin and tried again. "Boys, it's a mighty serious business to make a mistake an' take a man's life without giving him a show to tell the courts his story."

A big hook-nosed man, the worse for liquor, laughed savagely. "You're right, it's serious. Dave Stone's liable to find that out. Jas is c'rect. This fellow had ought to be strung up to a telegraph pole. Me, I expect to do some pulling on the rope that's round his gullet."

The fierce murmur of assent told Yerby that opposition was useless. Argument was a waste of time.

He moved away reluctantly, forgetting to take his snake-bite medicine with him when he left the saloon. For he was troubled. This thing was wrong, he felt. Yet he did not know how to prevent it.

At Basford's he found little encouragement. On the porch were Simp Shell, a cowpuncher whom he knew as Red, and Medford a tenderfoot clerk. Simp wanted to know in his indolent drawling voice what was new.

"Why, nothing I reckon, except—Say, Simp, the devil's broth is brewin' in town today. The boys are aimin' to lynch Dave Stone."

"Looks thataway," admitted Shell. "I'm not for it myself after he come in an' give himself up—not till we hear the right of the story, but of course if they're h—l bent on it—"

The nester shook his head. "Something queer about this deal. I don't get it a-tall. Me, I don't hold with these killers. Time we settled down an' became decent folks an' law-abidin' citizens." But there's somethin' about Dave Stone—well, I guess he's a killer all right, but I'd trust him all the way an' back."

"But Jas Stark says—"

"I know what he says, an' wouldn't trust him any farther than I could throw a bull by the tail, neither him nor that Carl Gitner. They're bad eggs, both of 'em. There's somethin' back of this, I tell you, if we knew what it was."

"Stone had a talk with Le Page an' then shut up like a clam, I understand. Hank's gone to Tucson on business."

"He has?" Yerby's thoughts moved fast. "Then they aim—the Circle Cross outfit does—to get Stone outa jail an' hang him while Hank's away. They'll do it, too, sure as you're a foot high."

"I ain't allowin' to stop 'em, Jim. Are you?"

"I don't know as I am," Yerby conceded reluctantly. "But looks to me like the decent citizens would get together an' serve notice that there would be nothin' doin' in necktie parties far as this case goes."

Simp's forefinger fanned the air. "Now tha's right where you're 'way off, Jim. If Jas was fixin' to hang you why I reckon some of us would wake up an' ask some questions. But this Stone—why, we don't care a billy-be-d—n whether he gets hung or not. They're all in the same crowd—no-'count triflin' fellows hellin' around an' makin' trouble for the rest of us. There's just one plain word for killers. They're cold-blooded murderers. Most of 'em would just as lief shoot a man in the back as in front. Point of fact, they'd rather, if they think they can get away with it, because there's less danger in it. You can't get me to shed any tears about this Stone."

Yerby tried one or two other representative citizens elsewhere and met with the same lack of response. The general sentiment was that neither Jasper Stark nor Carl Gitner were any good but so long as they confined their attention to Stone they might go as far as they liked.

The little man gave up with a shrug of his shoulders. The feeling of the town had its weight with him. After all, Stone was a "bad man" and probably deserved the fate hanging over him. Yerby loaded his supplies on the pack horse, arranged the lash rope, and threw a squaw hitch. Presently he was out of town and headed homeward.

On the way home Yerby stopped at the sheep ranch to leave a sack of flour and some coffee he had bought for the Giffords. Ann came to the door at his call.

"Miss Ethel not home?" he asked.

"No. She rode out with a message for Tony."

"Maybe just as well. I got news for you, Miss Ann."

A bitter smile broke the lines of her thin sardonic face. "News is always bad news for us," she said. "What is it?"

"I don't know as you could call this right bad news. That Dave Stone of the Circle Cross outfit has give himself up an' confessed that he killed Tom McArdle."

Ann was literally struck dumb with astonishment. She stared incredulously at the nester.

"Dave Stone says he killed McArdle," she repeated.

"Yes, ma'am. Come through clean as a whistle, they say. Sheriff Le Page he give it out himself. I didn't get to talk with him, because Hank's outa town. Gone to Tucson, I hear. I'm right sorry about that, too, because he'll be needed in town tonight, looks like. Some of the Circle Cross outfit are makin' trouble. They're aimin' to break into the jail an' lynch Stone."

Beneath the tan the color faded from the face of the young woman. "Because he killed Tom McArdle?" she asked in a hoarse whisper.

"Tha's why. Jas Stark is stirring up feeling. Him an' that Gitner."

"I'm going to town," Ann announced. "Can you go with me?"

"Why, I reckon so," he replied, taken aback. "But Mesa ain't any place for a young lady like you-all—not tonight. The lid's off an' there's certainly going to be wild times. You can't do a thing. I know, because I did my darndest. They're h—l-bent on going through with this."

"I can tell them the truth—that I killed him myself."

It was his turn to stare. "McArdle?" he asked. "You killed Tom?"

"Yes. I'll tell you all about it on the way. But let's get started—please. We may be too late already."

Yerby went to the corral. He roped and saddled a horse while Ann changed her dress and wrote a hurried note to Ethel.

"Miss Ann, you ain't gonna be able to put it over," the old-timer warned her. "I'm scared to death you'll git into trouble yore own self. I hadn't ought to let you go to Mesa."

"I'm going," she told him with finality. "When I tell them I did it and why—"

"I've been in mobs," he persisted. "I've heard 'em roar when the pore devil they was waitin' to hang was brought out. It's awful."

"I've got to do what I can." She swung to the saddle and started down the road.

There was nothing for him to do but follow.

When they came to a long hill and were forced for a short time to walk the horses he once more remonstrated with her.

"If it would do any good I wouldn't say a word, Miss Ann. But it won't."

"Do you think I can sit still and let them kill a man I know is innocent?"

He knew by the set look in her young face, the intentness of her gaze, that she could not be moved from her purpose. But he could not consent in silence.

"He claimed he did it, Miss Ann—went in and told Le Page so. Whyfor did he do that if it ain't so?"

"I don't know." A faint flame of color beat into the cheeks beneath the tan. "But how could he have done it when I—when I shot Tom McArdle myself?"

"If you'll tell me the story, Miss Ann—"

She told it, almost as she had done to her sister, just as she had gone over it in her own mind a hundred dreadful times. There was a relief in confession.

Yerby's wrinkled leathery hand reached across to the pommel of the saddle where hers rested and gave a comforting little pressure. "I'm with you at every turn of the road, Miss Ann."

The young woman looked at him and nodded, a lump in her throat. Since life had wounded her so greatly she had tried to encase her heart in ice, resolved to fend off friendship. In the shame of her hurt she had hugged her passionate resentment, cherishing it as a virtue instead of the evil thing it was. To look at this brown-faced little cowman, whom she had helped in his need, was to know that his loyalty would never falter.

And there was another who had offered friendship and been rejected—the man who was lying in the jail at Mesa while the town seethed with propagated hate. Even now the mob might be storming the prison to blot out his life. He was dangerous, men said, of a cold and deadly temper it was not safe to cross. But the David Stone beneath this surface armor of defense was a wholly different one, Ann was convinced. She knew him kind and strong and steadfast. To save her he had taken on himself the burden of her guilt. He would not weaken. If he died it would be for her.

They rode fast, for Ann was consumed with anxiety. Just before they reached the river a rider swung into the road twenty-five yards ahead of them. At sight of Ann and her escort he reined up.

"Have you heard?" he asked.

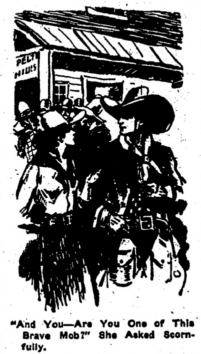
"That you folks from the Circle Cross are workin' up the town to lynch Dave Stone? Yes, we've heard that." Yerby replied curtly.

Phil flushed angrily. He was much excited. "No such a thing," he retorted angrily. "There won't be any lynching if I can stop it. I don't get this business, but I'm dead sure of one thing. Stone never killed Tom McArdle unless he had it to do."

"He didn't kill him," Ann said quickly. "I did."

The boy's eyes grew big and troubled. "Then why did he say he shot him?"

"Because he was our uncle's friend and wanted to be ours. But does it matter what his reason is?" Ann asked impatiently. "I tell you I did it. I shot the man and left him there. Surely I ought to know."



"And You—Are You One of This Brave Mob?" She Asked Scornfully.

Almost on the wings of the wind the news spread that the Texas killer was to be lynched for the murder of Tom McArdle. By word of mouth it came from the cowpuncher Red to Julia. Red had wanted to stay in town and share the excitement, but he had agreed to skin a jerkline string to Monarch with supplies for the Ben Bolt mine. And he prided himself that he was a man of his word.

"Come night they'll sure put it up to Mike Rand to open the jail door an' turn over Dave to them. If he killed poor Tom McArdle like they claim he did hangin' ain't any too good for him. Jas has sure got the right of it when he says we hadn't ought to stand for them Texas bad men comin' in an' bumpin' off our own boys."

The sound of her brother's name dragged Julia out of the shock the news had given her. "Is Jas mixed up in this?" she asked quickly.

It occurred to Red that perhaps he had been indiscreet. He went through the process of what he would have called stalling.

"Well now, Miss Julia, I expect everybody's in it more or less."

He was putty in her hands. Inside of two minutes she had the truth out of him.

Julia was greatly troubled. In the past weeks she had come to know the little Texan. It was impossible for her to believe that he was a cold-blooded murderer. He had been a friend when she needed one, at a time when her own brother had failed. In the phrase of the Southwest he would do to tie to, she felt sure. Now, somehow, he was caught in this net and would be destroyed.

And Jasper was leading the mob against him—Jasper who had always claimed to be a friend of his. She knew her brother was not doing it because of his love of justice. Instinctively she felt, with dread, that there was some sinister motive she could not guess.

Like Ann Gifford her impulse was all for action. She could not sit down quietly and let events take their course. Phil was not at the ranch. He could not go to town with her. But Dominick Rafferty could and would. She sent Red to find and bring him.

Unfortunately Rafferty was not to be found. Julia took with her instead the wrangler Sam Sharp, leaving word for Rafferty to follow as soon as they could get word to him.

They rode through the falling night. The stars were out when they drew into the outskirts of the little town. An unusual excitement could be felt. Many people were on the streets.

Julia stopped one hurrying man to ask fearfully if the jail had been yet stormed. At recognition of him she gave a startled little cry. The eyes that looked up into hers were those of Wilson McCann.

"Not yet, Miss Stark," he answered.

"And you—are you one of this brave mob?" she asked scornfully.

"No."

She forgot that he was a McCann, sealed of the tribe of the enemy. She remembered only that the life of a man she liked was in great danger. "Can't you save him?" she cried. "He didn't do it—not the way they say he did. I know better. He's not that kind of man."

Her appeal went home to him instantly. "I'll try."

"What can you do?" she asked eagerly, wistfully.

The sense of her sweet dependence flowed in on him like a stream of cold bracing water. He had not the least idea what he could do, but he was suddenly sure that he would find a way.

"We've got to move fast," he said, his brain working as he talked. "I'll get myself appointed deputy sheriff by Mike Rand. You go to yore friends. Tell 'em what you've told me. Try to stir up an opposition sentiment."

"If I could see Jasper—if I could talk with him—"

Even as she spoke an idea flashed into the mind of McCann. "Don't you," he urged. "I'll see him. I'll talk with him."

"You!" Her eyes dilated. "You don't mean—you wouldn't—"

"I'll not hurt him," he promised. "But there's just a chance I could persuade him to be reasonable. I've got an argument that might work with him. No time to talk it over with you now."

"Well," she agreed doubtfully.

"That's my secret, how I figure on doing it." He smiled up into the dark vivid eyes to assure her it was no dark and dreadful one. "Now we got to get busy right quick."

"Yes," came her obedient answer.

Afterward she was surprised at the meekness with which she surrendered to him, to the arch enemy of her family, the direction of her actions.

"See everybody you can who might help," he told her. "My brother Lyn is in town, probably at the Legal Tender. He's a good man. Send for him. Tell him I'll be at the jail. If he can get half a dozen men with rifles it'll do the business. They'll have to come up the creek bed and in the back way. You keep off the streets yoreself. Outdoors in this town is no place for women tonight. Sam here will do yore errands for you."

"Sure will," Sam volunteered.

What McCann said was true. The streets were full of men loitering, men whispering together, men hurrying to and fro, but of women there was no evidence. More than one pair of searching eyes during that minute of hurried talk had challenged her right to be out.

"I'll stay in," Julia promised, an access of color in her dark cheeks.

He nodded, casually, and turned away. Her gaze followed him as he moved down the street, walking with the strong purposeful stride of one who knew what he was about to do and the best way to do it. A primal emotion, old as the race, surged up in her unexpectedly. For the moment he was not the man she hated but the one who filled her life.

Before Wilson McCann put into execution the plan he had in mind he paid a visit to Mike Rand, jailor and deputy sheriff.

The jail was already being watched, but after a few words with those in front Wilson was allowed to go in. The instructions of the armed men posted near were not to allow the deputy to pass out with his prisoner. Nothing had been said about people going into the jail.

"What you aimin' to do, Mike?" McCann asked the jailer.

"About what?"

"This lynchin' Jas Stark is workin' up."

"What do you reckon I aim to do?" Rand asked sulkily. "I'm sheriff here in Hank's absence."

"Meanin' that you'll fight, I reckon." McCann shook his head. "No chance, Mike. Let me light out with Stone an' keep him hidden till this blows over."

The deputy rejected this proposition flatly. "No, sir. He'll stay right here. Hank left him in my charge, for me to keep in jail. Once I turn him loose I'd never see him again."

"I'd agree to deliver him when he was wanted."

"Hmp! An' what would Dave Stone be doin'? No, sir. He'll stay right in his cell. That's where he belongs. If the mob takes him from me I can't help it."

From that decision Wilson was unable to move the deputy.

CHAPTER X

Ann Tells Her Story

On the outskirts of the group that Jasper Stark was haranguing a Mexican appeared. He waited to edge in his message.

"Senorita Stark ees at the back door and weeshes to spik with you, senor."

Jasper frowned angrily. He understood what this meant. Julia had come to protest against the outbreak he was instigating. He strode out of the saloon into the starlit night all primed for a burst of indignation at her unwomanly conduct in coming to town on such an errand. It died away on his lips. Julia was not there. A man moved forward to meet him out of the darkness.

Jasper started. The heart died in him under his ribs. The first swift impulse in him was to turn and run back into the saloon. But the man had stepped to the door and was barring the way.

"You lemme go, Wils McCann," he ordered. "I got no business with you." Voice and eyes both betrayed him. The one shook with fear, the others mirrored it. For it was in his thought that his enemy had lured him out to shoot him down.

"But I got business with you. Don't be so scared. I'll not hurt you if you go with me quietly."

McCann had not drawn a gun. The only weapon in sight was the steady compulsion of two steel-blue eyes.

"Go-go where?"

"To the jail. I've got something to say to you."

"Say it right here then." Jasper began to breathe easier. He was still very uneasy, but the panic that had taken him by the throat was subsiding. If McCann did not mean to destroy him, if no physical violence was intended, he could probably talk himself out of trouble.

"Not here. We might be interrupted."

"I ain't going to step with you." Suspicions were flying like blind bats through Jasper's brain. Perhaps McCann meant to draw him to a lonely spot and murder him.

"You got no right to take me. You can't do it. You're not the sheriff and you've got no warrant for my arrest," Jasper quavered.

"I know I can't, but I'm going to." Somehow a revolver had jumped into sight and was lying in McCann's hand, pointed groundward. "You walk on my right side, close to me, so's my arm will be under yore coat. If you try to run or call to anyone, why I reckon that'll be suicide. Walk beside me easy an' steady an' there won't be any trouble. Tha's right. I don't reckon the gun barrel will prod yore ribs to hurt."

They walked down the alley and crossed the street to the alley of the next block. This brought them to a dry creek.

"Go right ahead," McCann directed.

Stark drew back at the edge of the descent into the arroyo. His throat went dry. His stomach sank within him. Was he to be dry-gulched down in the cottonwoods at this lonely spot? It was the very sort of thing he would have contrived himself for an enemy.

Before he could speak he had to moisten his lips. "You—you're aimin' to murder me," he managed to get out in a hoarse whisper.

"I told you I wouldn't hurt you if you were reasonable. I'm takin' you to jail, by the back way. Step lively. I've no time to waste."

The man in front of the gun shuffled down through the loose rubble to the creek bed. He had no choice. He moved up the creek bed in the darkness through the cottonwood grove, and as he stumbled forward he pleaded abjectly with the man whom he had more than once tried to kill.

American Hotels First to Use Bills of Fare

No bill of fare was necessary when Jacob made the mess of pottage for Esau—it was a one-course meal lacking even the simplest refinements. Neither did the early Romans follow a menu card in their choice of food, although the word "menu" itself is derived from the Latin "minutus," meaning "minute detail." (From this the deduction follows that "menu" is used to denote the particulars of the different courses of a meal.)

Indeed the term was used among the Romans, but the practice of entertaining both guest and traveler in the "domus" precluded the need for a written card.

Even the prevalence of inns and taverns in Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth century England and the American taverns of the Eighteenth and early Nineteenth centuries failed to produce the menu card. For still there was little need for it with all the travelers seated at one great table and the innkeepers' wife serving "victuals" of her own choice.

The frivolous elegant styles of the second empire in France and the opening of the first American hotels about the middle of the Nineteenth century brought the bill of fare. The United States hotel of Philadelphia, Foley's National hotel of Norfolk, Va., and the New York hotel of New York were the last word in fashion about 1850 with menus of long, narrow slips of poor paper, never cardboard, and the names of the dishes written in under printed headings.

Pot Menders

"Traveling tinkers still come our way but not one can tell me how they got their name," a reader complains. It is a corruption of "tinkler." Before motor traffic, itinerant tinsmiths warned villages of their approach by ringing a small bell.—London Answers.

Earth's Chemicals

The number of so-called chemical elements which enter into the earth's composition is more than eighty, but few of these figure as important constituents of the portion known to us. Nearly one-half of the mass of this shell is oxygen and more than a quarter is silicon. The remaining quarter is made up largely of aluminum, iron, calcium, magnesium and the alkalies sodium and potassium, in the order named. These eight constituent elements are the only ones that are important parts of the earth's surface shell. They are not found in the free condition, but combined in proportions characteristic of chemical compounds, and are known as minerals.

Rat-Kangaroo Still Lives

The rat-kangaroo of Australia, long thought extinct, has been rediscovered by H. H. Finlayson of Adelaide university, that country. In a letter in Nature, a scientific periodical published in London, he points out that since 1843 it has been feared this queer animal had become extinct. The writer claims he has not only rediscovered the long lost desert inhabitant, but has obtained specimens in all stages of development. They live in the sandhill country between the Diamantina and Coopers rivers. They are marsupials and possess pouches in which they carry their young.

This Man Had Faith Lost 24 Pounds

"Last November I weighed 192 lbs. Today, (February 5th, 1932) I am down to 168 lbs. and full of pep all day long—since using Kruschen I have not had to use the laxative that was customary." — Theo. A. C. LaFleur, Providence, R. I.

What do you think of this—you men who doubt—you stay fat—because you want to think that nature made you that way.

You're all wrong—most fat men were made fat because of their ability to handle a knife and fork in a business like manner.

Be frank with yourself. Are you too timid to take a safe, harmless conditioner that not only takes off surplus fat but is so helpful that it makes you feel years younger?

To reduce safely take one-half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water before breakfast every morning—cut down on fatty meats, potatoes and sweets. Kruschen is sold by druggists the world over. A jar that costs but a trifle will last four weeks—but be sure you get Kruschen—your health comes first.

President Hoover Declares Himself for Change in Prohibition Amendment—Roosevelt Hears Mayor Walker's Defense—Secretary Stimson Angers Japan.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

PRESIDENT HOOVER opened the campaign for his re-election with his acceptance speech, and told the nation that, in regard to the liquor question, he stood not exactly on the Republican platform but a considerable step ahead of it. He said the administration's efforts to enforce national prohibition had been of no avail because the Eighteenth amendment itself was a failure except in states where the majority sentiment was actually dry. He declared he could not consent either to restoration of the saloon or to the continuance of such grave abuses as the speakeasy and the bootlegger which flourish under the amendment. Therefore, he proposed such modification of the prohibition amendment as would return liquor control to the states under federal control that would guarantee the dry states federal aid in keeping out liquor and prevent the restoration of the saloon in the wet states.

President Hoover

In substance the position taken by Mr. Hoover on this prohibition problem is very close to that of Alfred E. Smith in 1928. It was warmly indorsed by the Republican senators who consented to talk about it, even by such veteran drys as Fess and Borah. The Republican press generally commended it, and Democratic newspapers praised the President for "bravery greater than that of his party platform."

The President's address of course covered practically all the subjects that appear in the Republican platform and was written with skill. In it he reiterated his stand for freedom in industry and commerce as opposed to radical and revolutionary proposals, for a protective tariff, for noncancellation of foreign debts, and pledged himself to work for restoration of prosperity.

The notification ceremony took place in Constitution hall and the speech was heard by 4,000 persons gathered there and by countless millions who listened in by radio. The affair was preceded by a garden party and buffet luncheon on the White House grounds, to which 700 men and women had been invited. Former President Calvin Coolidge was not there because, as he said, he feared the trip would aggravate the hay fever from which he was suffering.

MAYOR JAMES WALKER of New York, appearing before Governor Roosevelt in the latter's office in Albany, made an impassioned plea for the right to face and question the witnesses who have accused him and whose testimony before the Seabury committee resulted in the demand that the governor remove him from office. Mr. Roosevelt ruled that the mayor might present any witnesses or evidence that would contribute to the governor's examination of the case. He did not require the proof of Mr. Walker's guilt to be shown by witnesses, but he did go at once into a cross-examination of the mayor himself.

Mayor Walker's answers followed closely his previous defense as given in his formal answer to the Seabury charges and in his testimony before the legislative committee. He admitted taking the $26,000 gift from J. A. Sisto, banker interested in taxicab legislation, but denied he had given of his influence as mayor to obtain the legislation.

Answering the charge that he owned securities in a company doing business with the city, in violation of a state law, Walker asserted he knew nothing about its connection with city contracts.

In succeeding sessions of the hearing he continued along the same line, denying all charges of misconduct and defending the acts on which those charges were based.

JAPAN, continually on the defensive concerning her course in Manchuria and extremely sensitive to criticism, whether direct or implied, has been aroused to great official indignation by Secretary of State Henry L. Stimson. In an address before the council on foreign relations in New York the cabinet officer asserted that consultation among signatory nations to mobilize "moral disapproval" of acts of aggression is implicit in the Briand-Kellogg treaty outlawing war and that a definite pact providing for such consultation is unnecessary. As an example, the secretary of state referred to the American protest to Japan against hostilities in China. Such a protest would have had far less weight, he pointed out, had it not been supported by "the entire group of civilized nations."

Sec'y Stimson

Later in his address Mr. Stimson said:

"As it stands, the only limitation to the broad covenant against war is the right of self-defense. This right is so inherent and universal that it was deemed unnecessary even to insert it expressly in the treaty. It exists in the case of the individual under domestic law, as well as in the case of the nation and its citizens under the law of nations. Its limits have been clearly defined by countless precedents.

"A nation which sought to mask imperialistic policy under the guise of the defense of its nationals would soon be unmasked. It could not long hope to confuse or mislead public opinion on a subject so well understood or in a world in which facts can be so easily ascertained and appraised as they can be under the journalistic conditions of today."

The Japanese foreign office took Mr. Stimson's remarks as an attack on Japan's acts in Manchuria and cabled the embassy in Washington for a detailed report of the speech. It was believed that formal protest might be made to the United States government.

ROY D. CHAPIN, the Detroit automobile manufacturer, was sworn in as secretary of commerce to succeed Robert P. Lamont, who resigned to become president of the American Iron and Steel institute. As he took office Mr. Chapin gave expression to his optimism, saying: "Naturally, like every other American, I am gratified by the unmistakably better tone that now prevails in our industries and marts of trade. Concerning the future trend, I will not be so bold as to venture prediction now, but one thing is certain—we must all exert ourselves to the utmost striving to strengthen all favorable factors and to make the inevitable turn come as soon and with as much security as possible."

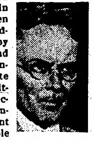
R. D. Chapin

Secretary Chapin is already encouraging the railroads to go ahead with repair and replacement work and finding money to help them do it; and in co-operation with Secretary of Labor Doak he is working on the plans for spreading employment by decreasing the individual hours of work.

FOR about twenty-four hours there was a spectacular attempt at revolution in Spain by the monarchists who hoped to restore the Bourbons to the throne. The movement was led by Gen. Jose Sanjurjo, known as "the lion of Morocco," and for a time he and his helpers were in control of Seville. But the republican government was apprised of his plans in advance and the revolt was speedily squelched mainly by the police. Sanjurjo himself was arrested as he fled from Seville and was taken to Madrid for trial by court martial, and various others of the former king's military commanders also were apprehended. In Madrid there was little fighting when revolutionists sought to occupy government buildings.

The whole affair was a mixture of comedy and tragedy and the net result was the burning of many royalists clubs, homes and residences by the republicans in several cities, and the prospect of death at the hands of firing squads for the royalist leaders.

REWARD for his uniformly successful prosecutions of gangsters and politicians for evasion of the federal income tax has come to George E. Q. Johnson, United States attorney in Chicago. He has been appointed to the federal District bench by President Hoover, and probably will be confirmed by the senate in December with little opposition. As successor to Mr. Johnson, the President named Johnson's able assistant in the tax cases, Dwight H. Green, who has been solicitor for the bureau of internal revenue and has conducted many of the trials instituted by Johnson. Both the appointments were urged by Senators Glenn and Lewis of Illinois.



G. E. Q. Johnson

Johnson began his drive against hoodlums and crooked politicians in the fall of 1929, first indicting Ralph Capone and Terry Druggan and Frankie Lake. Other indictments followed, and trials, and Mr. Johnson was successful in sending the following persons to the penitentiary for evading income taxes: Al Capone, Ralph Capone, Druggan, Lake, Jack Guzik, Sam Guzik, Frank Nitti, former County Assessor Gene G. Oliver, and former State Representative Lawrence C. O'Brien. Christian P. Paschen, building commissioner in the last Republican Chicago municipal administration, is now under sentence, but has appealed his conviction.

CHANCELLOR VON PAPEN and his cabinet acted to stop terrorism among the political factions of Germany by decreeing the death penalty for all persons convicted of acts of political violence, including rioting, treason, arson, instigation of explosions or floods or damaging railways or railway equipment. Despite this rigorous action, the acts of violence did not cease. Adolf Hitler issued a proclamation to his storm troops to curb their disorderly enthusiasm.

Von Papen invited both Hitler's National Socialists and Hugenberg's Nationalists to share in the government which he will submit to the reichstag when it convenes August 30. But the monocled chancellor is determined to keep the office of chancellor and to maintain the government on the "no-party" basis. The Hitlerites continue to claim full governmental control.

WHEN the field and track events of the Olympic games came to a close it was found the United States had won first place by a tremendous margin; Finland was second and Great Britain third. The climax of this part of the program was the marathon race, which was won by Juan Zabala of Argentina in record-breaking time. The second week was given over to all kinds of events, mainly in the water, and Helene Madison, the premier woman swimmer of the United States, distinguished herself again by winning the 100 meters free-style race in the new Olympic time of 1:08. She was first in the fastest field of girl swimmers ever assembled, and every one of them beat the old Olympic record.

Helene Madison

In other water events the flags of Japan, Holland, Australia and other nations were raised.

MUCH of the work of the British imperial conference in Ottawa was completed during the week and the delegates thought they might be able to leave by August 20. However, the questions that most interest the United States were still unsettled, these being the trade relations between Canada and Great Britain. The dominion's offer of preferences on manufactured goods was rejected by the British delegates as not good enough. The Canadians thought their offer ought to mean about $55,000,000 extra trade for Britain every year, but the British could not figure the gain at more than $10,000,000 a year.

The British made satisfactory trade arrangements with the Australians, the New Zealanders and the South Africans. Points on which the conference fails to agree will be referred to a permanent committee.

ALL the neutral nations of Central and South America joined with the United States in calling on Bolivia to lay down her arms and accept arbitration of the dispute with Paraguay over the Gran Chaco. They even set a definite time for such submission, but Bolivia's reply was not especially satisfactory. President Daniel Salamanca's government said it was willing to suspend hostilities pending arbitration, if Paraguay and the neutral powers would consent to the present positions in the Gran Chaco as the basis for negotiations, instead of the positions of the troops on June 1, as stipulated by Paraguay. After June 15 Bolivian patrols captured three Paraguayan outposts.

President Salamanca

Pacifists in La Paz, Bolivia, who opposed war with Paraguay, were court-martialed and eight of them were condemned and shot.

Adventurous citizens of the United States have been offering their services to Paraguay and Bolivia, if war materializes, through their legations in Washington. One World war flyer with the rank of captain telegraphed both sides identical requests for service.

GEN. CHIANG KAI-SHEK, it appears likely, will be the supreme dictator of China. This results from the controversy between Wang Ching-wei, premier, and Marshal Chang Hsiao-liang, Peiping war lord. Chang refused to obey Wang's order to make war on the Japanese forces that were operating in Jehol province, and offered to resign. Soon after Wang and his entire cabinet submitted their resignations, the last to step out being Finance Minister T. V. Soong.

Chiang Kai-shek, unlike Wang, still thinks the Sino-Japanese dispute can be settled by direct negotiations and therefore refuses to take any warlike steps likely to antagonize Tokyo. Under the terms of the Chinese constitution, General Chiang as permanent chairman of the military council is untouchable and is in full control of the armies.

TWO Democratic senators were successful during the week in obtaining renominations. They were Alben W. Barkley of Kentucky, keynoter in the recent national convention, who defeated former Senator George B. Martin and others; and Mrs. Hattie W. Caraway of Arkansas, the only woman member of the upper house. Mrs. Caraway had six male rivals for the nomination but easily distanced them all.

Sod House Construction

A sod house is to be built in Topeka for tourists by the State Historical society. The sod house, which was the only habitation of settlers of western Kansas, should not be confused with the dugout. The sod house was built of great layers of sod and some that were built by the pioneers are still doing duty. Old-timers say the virtue of the sod house was its coolness in summer. If well constructed it was impervious to rain.

School to Open Sept. 6

The local school will open for the 1932-33 term on Tuesday September 6th. The teaching staff remains as last year, all members being retained in their respective positions. The school building has been thoroughly cleaned, repairs having been made where necessary, and is ready for occupancy.

Pupils are urged to enroll on the opening day and continue in regular attendance throughout the year. It is highly desirable that pupils should remain in school as much as possible. If, however, there are some pupils who are unable to attend regularly the first week or two, they should, nevertheless, register on the opening day. Patrons of the school are also cordially invited to visit the local school at any time. Visitors are always welcome.

Obituary

Lincoln John Horien was born in Holt on Feb. 12, 1931, and was at the time of his death on Aug. 24 one year, six months and twelve days old. His [illegible]h was caused by injuries received in an accident when he fell on an oil can, of which the spout penetrated his brain.

He leaves to mourn his loss his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Leo J. Horien, one sister, and three brothers.

Peace be unto his memory.

Farmer-Labor Picnic

The Pennington County Farmer-Labor Ass'n. has arranged for a big picnic and rally to be held at Squaw Point, Thief River Falls, Sunday Sept. 4.

Governor Floyd B. Olson and other speakers will be there.

A free discussion of the delinquent ditch tax problem together with prospective remedies for relief will take place at Holt on Thursday, Sept. 22 at 10 a. m. before the Marshall County Board of Commissioners, members of the board decided at their regular meeting held here last week, according to W. O. Braggans, county attorney.

The meeting is being held in Holt for the benefit of the many people living in the Eastern half of Marshall county, where most of the delinquent ditch lands are located, said Mr. Braggans.

The meeting will be an open one and everybody is invited to attend, as especially the people from the following townships: Linsell, Moose River, Thief Lake, Como, Huntly, East Park, Veldt, Rollis, Whiteford, Cedar, Vallay, Esplee, Moylan, Grand Plain and Agdar. It is highly important that the people in the above 15 townships attend as these townships were included in the survey which showed the delinquent ditch tax situation which is threatening the financial standing of the county.

The county board hopes that each township will send a representative delegation to the Holt meeting and that in the meantime, the people will study the proposed legislative act which is in the possesion of the chairman of each township.—Warren Sheaf.

STATE FAIR HAS NEW THRILLERS

World On Parade, Artillery Drill, Horse Push Ball, New Features.

America's greatest open-air entertainment program, one combining the newest and most thrilling sensations of the circus, theatrical and aerial worlds, will be presented at this year's Minnesota State Fair and Northwest Livestock Show, September 3 to 10.

A series of spectacular features, too colossal to be staged under one roof, have been welded into a gigantic $100,000 production that will spell fun, recreation and "A Good Time" for all Fair visitors.

Not only new and intriguing attractions have been added to the program, but the time honored features, approved by State Fair crowds for years, have been maintained on the same high standard, according to Raymond A. Lee, secretary.

1932 World on Parade 1932
Racing
Thrillers
Evening Horse Show
Rubin & Cherry

The 1932 edition of "The World on Parade," which tops the entertainment program, affords something new in diversified amusement. From the first note of music in the prologue to the last bursting rocket in the finale, Fair patrons are promised an evening production of breath-taking action in a setting of regal splendor.

A cast of 500, replete with superb costumes, stage settings and lighting effects undreamed of in the ordinary theater, and impossible at the Fair even five years ago, make this production a new chapter in the history of amusement. The show is climaxed by a brilliant display of fireworks.

Auto racing, open to all speedway and dirt track drivers, will be staged three days, Saturday, September 3, Wednesday, September 7, and Saturday, September 10.

Two hundred outstanding harness and running horses will compete for $10,700 in purses on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, September 5, 6, 8 and 9.

Smashing, slashing handling of coordinated horsemanship is featured in the spectacular artillery drill to be staged by Battery B, 18th Field Artillery, Fort Snelling. Eight teams of horses, six to a hitch, drawing gun carriages, will perform complicated military maneuvers in a dazzling exhibition of equestrian skill under the direction of Captain W. S. Bryant.

The Evening Horse Show is scheduled for five nights, September 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9.

Oscar Babcock, loop artist, will do his famed "death trap" loop in which he rides a bicycle down a 110-foot incline through a 30-foot loop and across a 25-foot gap.

Costi Florescu, sensational European high pole performer, will execute his "death swing" high in the air, flying through a 150-foot arc, hanging only by his teeth.

A dozen bands, headed by Cervone's world-famous musical organization, will furnish music.

On the Midway will be the Rubin & Cherry Shows, featuring forty new rides and attractions.

Auction Sale

Due to the fact that Carl Ellestad, deaf mute who was taken to the state detention hospital at Fergus Falls some time ago, will not be back to take care of his property, F. K. Fredrickson who is guardian for him will sell all the personal property at a public sale on the farm on Friday, Sept. 9.

Saw the Eclipse

Everybody were out with their smoked glasses on Wednesday afternoon to view the eclipse of the sun. The sky was clear and the eclipse which lasted for about two hours was clear enough to be photographed as the moon passed between the earth and the sun. It cooled off here during the height of the eclipse as the sun was 68 per cent covered.

Commercial Club Held Meeting

The business men of Holt who are members of the local Commercial Club met on Tuesday afternoon and had their annual meeting. New officers were elected for the coming year.

Geo. Fricker was elected president to succeed H. O. Hanson, who has held that position for six years. Einar Loven was elected secretary-treasurer, taking the place of Geo. Fricker, who has held that job for two years.

The Club decided to organize a trade campaign for the fall months with the merchants and business places taking part. It was agreed that all those business places who were situated to do so, would give away free tickets with each 50c purchase. Each month there would be a drawing held possibly the last Saturday of the month.

The Club also discussed several other business propositions and will no doubt have a busy lineup the next few weeks.

Committees were elected to arrange the details of the trade campaign and other things, and as soon as the tickets get here they will be given out. Further announcements will be made later.

Celecrated 80th Birthday

While scouting about town the other day we got into a little conversation with Nils Swanson and he informed us that on the 25th of August he celebrated his 80th birthday. He came to Winnipeg fifty years ago from Sweden but he only stayed there two years after which he moved to a homestead east of Erskine, in Polk county. About fifteen years ago he moved to Holt to make his home with his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Bennes.

Mr. Swanson is still able to stroll around town and feels pretty good. The News joins his many friends in wishing him many more birthdays.

SYNOPSIS

Wilson McCann, young Arizona ranchman, finds an old friend, Jim Yerby, with a broken leg. Julia Stark, daughter of Matthew Stark, inveterate enemy of the McCann, is with him. Jasper, Julia's brother, attempts to assassinate Wilson. Ann Gifford, with her young sister, Ethel, are sheep raisers, and on that account unpopular with the cattlemen. "Night riders" shoot a McCann rider. Peter McCann, Wilson's father, offers a reward for the disclosure of their identity. Wilson McCann horsewhips Jasper, he making practically no resistance. Matthew Stark posts notice he will kill Wilson McCann on sight. Ann Gifford's tragedy is the fate of her dead sister, Nora, betrayed and abandoned by her lover. Jasper Stark and Carl Gitner, known as a "killer," hold secret conferences. A Stark rider, Tom McArdle, is believed by the Starks to have been killed by the McCanns, but rumor links his name with that of Nora Gifford. Matthew Stark is killed, from ambush. Julia finds him dead, with Wilson McCann stooping over him. She and Phil, her younger brother, accuse McCann of the killing, despite his vehement denial. Wilson is shot from the chapparal, while standing over Matthew Stark's body. Believing him dying, the Starks have him taken to their home. Dave Stone, Stark rider, a Texan with a record as a "killer," openly doubts Wilson's guilt. Jasper is disinherited by his father's will. Wilson McCann is restored to health. Jasper Stark, despite the girl's aversion, seeks to persuade Ethel Gifford to marry him, holding over her the threat of revealing Ann as the slayer of Tom McArdle. Ann drives him from the ranch. Later she admits to Ethel that she killed McArdle, Nora's betrayer. No action as to Matthew Stark's killing is taken. An anonymous letter to the sheriff charges Ann Gifford with McArdle's murder. Dave Stone, hearing of this, confesses to the sheriff that he killed McArdle, the slaying being the result of McArdle's betrayal of Nora. Stone is confined in the jail at Mesa. Jim Yerby finds Jasper Stark and Gitner urging the lynching of Stone for McArdle's murder. He tells Ann Gifford, who insists she killed McArdle and Stone is trying to shield her. With Phil and Julia she rides to Mesa to tell her story and save Stone. Julia meets Wilson McCann and appeals to him for assistance. McCann "kidnaps" Jasper Stark.

—11—

"You wouldn't take advantage of me thisaway, Wils," he wheedled. "I ain't got a thing in the world against you-all. This family feud is plumb foolish. Tha's what I said to Jule. I says, 'Let's take Wils home an' nurse him.' I says, 'This shootin' was Dad's fault anyhow, an' Wils is a good fellow.' Honest, to G—d tha's what I told her. Wils. We looked after you right at the Circle Cross, didn't we? Done everything for you that we could?"

"I'm not going to hurt you," the other said with disgust. "No use lying to me. It don't buy you anything. . . . Move on up the bank here an' knock on the door."

Through the gloom the shadowy outline of a building had emerged. It was the back of the stone jail.

Jasper knocked on the iron-studded door.

"Who is it?"

"Wils McCann with a prisoner. That you, Mike?"

"Yep. It's sure enough you, Wils, is it?"

The deputy was already unlocking the door. His question had been surplusage, for he had recognized the voice. Nevertheless Rand's revolver covered the men as they entered.

"Whachawant?" he demanded.

"Why, I brought a trouble-maker along with me, Mike," answered Wilson. "I figured he was better here than shootin' off his mouth at the Gilt Edge. Got a cell handy for him?"

"You've got no right to hold me without a warrant. I won't stand for it a minute," blustered Jasper, now much reassured as to his safety.

"Incitin' to riot, Mike. Better hustle him into a cell. This is liable to be our busy night. I'm going back to get that Gitner if I can. If we get these two birds in jail an' nobody knows where they're at, the mob is going to drift around for awhile lookin' for its leaders. If we can stand 'em off a few hours there won't be any lynching. Mostly mobs are what you call temperamental."

Rand was Irish and ready to fight. If there was a chance to save his prisoner's life he was more than willing to take it. The appearance of a friend willing to play the game out with him was tremendously cheering. He knew the McCanns well. If they rallied to his aid there was a likelihood of success.

"Boy, I'm with you till Yuma gets snowbound," he cried with enthusiasm. "We'll put Mr. Stark in Number 40 an' give him a chanct to cool off."

Five minutes later a small colored boy was giving a message to the big Texan. "Gen'lman says Mistah Stark would like for to see you at the back doah, Mistah Gitner."

Busy though he had been drinking and exhorting, Gitner had missed his fellow conspirator and wondered where he had gone. That Jasper should send for him to hold a whispered conference away from the crowd was quite probable. Gitner swaggered to the rear of the saloon without an instant of misgiving.

He walked out of the back door straight into a forty-five, the barrel of which pressed against his stomach.

"Hands up, Gitner," came the hard crisp order.

The Texan had no option. His hands moved skyward.

Deftly McCann removed his revolvers.

"We're going down the alley," he explained in a low voice. "I don't aim to kill you unless you make some fool break. Do that, an' it will sure be yore funeral."

"What's the play if you're not fixin' to kill me?" Gitner asked.

"You'll find out. Now move—not too fast—an' don't look back. I might change my mind."

The Texan moved. He never argued with a man who had the drop on him and meant business. It was safer to watch for a chance and plug the fellow when he was not looking.

Wilson followed at his heels, the gun under one edge of the coat he wore unbuttoned. They reached the street unnoticed, crossed it without observation, and passed into the gloom of the alley beyond.

"Where you takin' me?" Gitner growled.

"To jail."

"What for?"

"Raisin' a riot."

The prisoner made no complaint about the illegality of this proceeding. It was high-handed of course, but the man behind a gun has the privilege of being that if he chooses. There was no use trying to talk McCann out of the advantage he held. Gitner did not attempt it. His cunning mind concentrated on the practical problem of escape.

The chance came as they were picking their way down into the small gulch. It was so dark that McCann was following close on the heels of the other. Gitner stumbled and fell. His arm swept out, caught the younger man's legs below the knees, and dragged them out from under him.

The revolver flew out of Wilson's hand as he went down. Before he could stop himself he had rolled down the steep ground on top of the Texan. They went to the bottom of the incline together, now one and now the other on top.

In the scramble of wildly flying legs the two men clung fast. But in that instant, while they were locked in each other's arms, Wilson realized that he was no match for his opponent at this kind of rough work. He was lighter by twenty-five pounds and he was still weakened from the effect of his recent wounds. To survive, he knew it would be necessary to break the other's bear-like hug. Otherwise his ribs would be crushed and the breath driven out of his body.

They landed in the creek bed with Gitner on top. The Texan laughed in savage triumph. He had his enemy at his mercy and knew it, though Wilson was still trying with short arm jolts to the jaw to break the viselike grip that encircled him.

"I gotcha, by G—d," the Texan grunted.

He shifted his hold. One hand pinned down the fist beating like a piston rod against his face. The other found the throat of the prostrate man, the sinewy fingers tightening until McCann strangled for breath.

Wilson knew he was lost unless he could escape from the grasp of steel encircling his neck. Yet it was by no set plan that he hit upon a way of saving himself. In his agony he drew up his feet and straightened them with swift force. The effect was astonishing. Gitner let out a shriek of pain. His throat hold loosened momentarily. Again McCann brought up his heels and raked them savagely down the calves of the other.

Gitner tore himself free, cursing, and got to his feet. The man's trouser legs were shredded and his limbs bleeding. The sharp spurs on Wilson's boots had ripped through to the flesh and roweled it mercilessly. He stood there cursing, furious with rage.

Before he recovered his reason the man on the ground covered him with his own revolver, drawn from the belt Wilson had fastened above his hips.

"Reach for the roof," McCann ordered.

The Texan glared at him savagely. His huge doubled fists worked spasmodically. He wanted to fling himself on this young fellow and stamp the life out of him. But under the menace of the forty-five he dared not attempt it.

McCann still struggled for breath in a world which swam in bubbles before his eyes. But Gitner did not know that. The big fists slowly moved up over the bullet-shaped Teutonic head

"If I had a gun—"

The subordinate clause was a threat which needed no conclusion to be understood.

"I'm still borrowin' it. Don't you move."

Slowly Wilson rose. Every moment he was breathing less raggedly and was seeing more clearly.

"If you're quite sure—you don't want to start something else, Mr. Gitner—we'll be moving on again," he said with an effort.

They traveled up the sandy wash, climbed from the creek bed, and were admitted into the jail.

"How's everything, Wils?" the deputy asked.

"Why, fine as silk. Brought you another prisoner, Mike."

"What's he been doin'?"

"Inciting to riot, too. Can you give him a nice quiet cell all by his lonesome?"

"Sure can do." To his prisoner the deputy said: "Come right along, Mr. Gitner. Room 27 for you."

When Rand had locked up the Texan he led his friend down the corridor toward the office.

"You sure set a good example, Wils," he said with a grin. "Since you left I've had more visitors offerin' to help me outa the hole I'm in. Two of 'em."

"Good. If we get four-five fighting men—"

"One of these is a lady," the deputy explained dryly.

"A lady!" McCann's mind flew to Julia Stark. Had she been so unwise as to come to the jail with the idea that she could be useful? It would be like her. She was both impulsive and unselfish.

"Why yes, a lady! Come right in an' meet her."

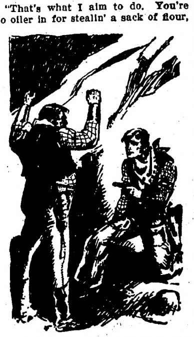
Wilson followed him into the office.

* * * * * * *

Before he had left for Tucson, Sheriff Le Page dropped in to Stone's cell. "If there's a thing more you need to make you comfortable, Dave—cigars or newspapers or a book to read—why, speak right up an' I'll see you get it."

"Not a thing, Hank. I'm doing fine. You're treatin' me like a parlor boarder."

"That's what I aim to do. You're no oiler in for stealin' a sack of flour, like yore next-door neighbor. Well, if there's anything you want while I'm away holler for it to Mike. He'll fix you up."



"Reach for the Roof," McCann Ordered.

Stone did not trouble the deputy with fussy requests. He read or lay on the iron cot and let his thoughts drift where they would. He found them turning, if he did not consciously direct them elsewhere, to a tight-lipped young woman whose last word to him had been that she did not want him for a friend.

When Rand brought dinner in for him at noon Stone detected in his manner a note of silent evasiveness foreign to the temperament of the garrulous Irishman. Within five minutes he knew what was troubling the deputy. The town was "wilding up." Looked like Jas Stark and Gitner might get the boys to do some crazy thing or other.

Stone's impassive eyes fastened to his. "Meanin' just what, Mike? Allowin' to hang me, are they?"

"Well, Jas Stark an' that Gitner are tellin' how you dry-gulched Tom McArdle."

Stone nodded "I know those birds. So they're fixin' to get rid of me? They would, of course. I've played right into their hands. What you going to do about it, Mike?"

"Well, I've wired Hank to come home an' I'm figurin' on swearing in some deputies to help me."

A sardonic smile touched the face of the Texan. "To help you protect Dave Stone, bad man an' killer. I reckon you'll find the boys some reluctant."

It proved to be as the prisoner predicted. Rand returned to him in the middle of the afternoon. From the cot where he was lying Stone looked up and read failure in the deputy's honest face.

"Well, you got the jail full of law-abidin' citizens?" Stone asked with gentle derision. "All of 'em anxious to go the limit for me?"

Rand's eyes confessed defeat.

"Don't worry, Mike," the Texan went on. "I knew it would be thataway. Question is, what do you aim to do now? Do I get a chance for my white alley, Mike?"

"How d'you mean?"

"Do I get my guns back, so I can take Gitner an' Stark with me on this long journey?"

"I don't reckon that would hardly be right, Dave. You're a prisoner."

"You'll turn me over to be lynched, then, by two murderers who want me outa the way because they're afraid I've got the goods on them."

Rand had an inspiration. "No, sir. If it comes to a showdown I'll swear you in as a deputy," he promised.

"I'll promise not to throw down on you, this time," Stone assured him with mordant irony.

During the long afternoon the deputy was in and out of the prisoner's cell a dozen times to consult him. The Texan showed no emotion or excitement. He faced imperturbably the shadows of darkness drawing closer to him. Whatever of despair he may have felt in his heart did not reach the chill mask of his face.

Through the window he looked down at Mesa, and he knew that the men hurrying to and fro on the streets were thinking of the fate in store for him.

The chances were that he would never again see the glory of a new day, the sunlight streaming across the silvery sage of the desert. He had lived hard, but on the whole clean. They had called him the good bad man because he never wasted his force in futile dissipation. Would that serve him where he was going? He smiled grimly, wondering.

Night fell. Stone walked to the barred window and looked out. The lights of the town were coming out one by one. He could see that the place buzzed with excitement like a hive of swarming bees.

"Soon now," he told himself quietly.

He thought of many things almost forgotten—of schooldays in the small town where he had been born, of boys not recalled in years, of the scrape which had driven him to the Texas frontier. Scenes in his turbulent life, some of them detached and episodic, jumped to mind vividly.

One of these showed a barroom, and inside it a swaggering bully and bad man "devilling" a boy of seventeen. It showed the flash of guns, the surprised desperado sinking slowly to the floor while the boy stared at him with fear-filled eyes at thought of what he had done. From the hour he had killed King Hill, in the eyes of the world David Stone had been marked with a brand he could not escape.

The door of the cell opened and Rand's head was thrust in. "Lady to see you, Dave."

Stone turned swiftly. A young woman was moving across the threshold of the room. He recognized instantly her slender erectness.

"You—Miss Ann!" he exclaimed, amazed.

She moved forward, and when she was close he saw that her face was working with emotion.

"Why did you do it?" she cried in a low voice.

"Do what?"

"You know. You know. Pretend that you shot Tom McArdle."

"Other folks were being suspected. I figured I'd better tell the truth."

"It's not the truth. You know it isn't. I killed him."

"No, ma'am. You thought so, but you didn't."

"How can you say that? I saw him fall from his horse when I shot."

"I'll tell you about that, Miss Ann," he said, and related to her the same story he had told the sheriff.

"I don't believe a word of it," she replied, and there was a sob in her voice. "You're doing it because I'm in trouble about it, and now—they're going to—to—"

"I know," he said gently. "Don't you worry, Miss Ann. I'm a hard citizen. Anyone will tell you that. I'm only gettin' what's comin' to me. An' about McArdle—it's sure enough true. I killed him. If I hadn't of, how would I know he'd made his brags that he was comin' over to yore place even when you didn't want him?"

She could not wholly deny that bit of corroborative evidence. But she saw another possibility, a more likely one. "Maybe you found him before he—died. Maybe he told you."

He shook his head, meeting her eyes steadily. "No, ma'am. I told you the straight of it. He said something no decent man would say. I called for a showdown an' beat him to the draw. He had better than an even chance."

She threw out her hands in an impatient little gesture of abandon. "I don't care what you say. If you did it—and I don't believe it yet—you did it for me. You're shielding me now. That's why you gave yourself up, so that people wouldn't blame me. And I had treated you mean—wouldn't let you be my friend. Then you do this for me. But I won't have it. I'm going to stop it. I'll tell them I did it and they'll let you go." Ann ended on a rising note close to hysteria.

The gunman was close to death. The dull roar of its menace echoed up to him from the street a block away. He did not think of that now. In his blood there drummed a beat of joy. In that hour he was nearer to the woman he loved than ever he had been before. But no flicker of feeling was allowed to reach his poker face.

"Nothing to that," he said quietly. "This is a private grudge an' those holding it will git me if they can. You're not in this. What's the sense of you mixin' in? It won't help me any, an' you'll get in bad yoreself. If I was you I'd go straight home an' not say a word to anybody. Maybe things will work out all right for me. You never can tell."

His coldness chilled her, but she would not give up. "Go home!" she repeated. "Leave you here to die when—when—" She put her hands up to her face and broke into violent sobbing.

The Texan stepped closer and touched her arm gently with his hand. "Don't you take on thataway," he begged. "Don't you."

After a time, through the catches of her breath he caught the answer. "What kind of a woman do you think I am—to go home and fold my hands while—while—"

"I think you're the salt of the earth, Miss Ann," he told her simply. "You've risked a heap in tryin' to help me—what folks will think, an' what this crazy mob would be liable to do if they found you here with me. It's the biggest thing any woman ever did for me—except my mother. But there's no way you can help me more than you've done already. So I say, don't get yore name mixed up with me in this. I'll likely make the grade. I've been in tighter places than this an' come through all right. Do I look like I was worried about it?"

Before he had finished speaking there rose a sound such as Ann had never heard before. It had in it something of the wild beast's triumphant scream when it has brought its kill to bay. At that yell of hundreds of voices answering the call of the old savage blood-lust she shuddered with terror. The dread of it crashed over her senses like a great wave lifting her from her fet. The room tilted and objects swam together in a haze of bubbles.

When her eyes opened she found herself looking up into the face of Stone. He was supporting her in his arms.

"You fainted," he explained.

An appreciation of the situation flowed back into her mind.

"I—was frightened. It's dreadful. If someone would talk to them, would explain things—"

He shook his head. "No use. They're beyond talk," he said quietly.

"But there must be some way. There must be," she pleaded desperately.

"We'll fight 'em off," he promised. "Time for you to go, Miss Ann. If Mike figures it's safe, have him let you out the back way. Then you go straight home."

She was pallid beneath the tan. Her lips trembled. He knew that she was shaky on her legs.

"If you die it will be for me," she told him in a whisper. "I'll never forget it—never as long as I live."

"I'm not figurin' on dying," he told her, with a steady cheerfulness designed to deceive. "Adios! You'll have to hurry."

He had not removed his arms from her for fear her strength had not fully returned. Her eyes, with all the gift of her love in them, sank fathoms deep in his. Again he knew the exultant beat of drumming pulses. Unworthy though he was, he knew that she had given to him the inner citadel of her heart.

Because the end of the passage was so near for him and because he divined that in the years to come it would be a comfort to her, he drew her close to him and kissed her lips.

Then, without another word, she was gone.

Again there came to him on the light night breeze the ominous yell of the man-hunters.

How Chemical Research Has Helped the World

There is no single "cure-all" drug for every ill that flesh is heir to; even the "same" disease in different men does not always yield to the same drug. The chemist dare not generalize in drug research for the needs of a human mechine which recent discoveries have proved to be so delicate that the absence of five-millionths of a gramme of a vitamin appreciably shortens the life of man.

Specialized research has placed so much at the disposal of the modern doctor that such a common disease as rickets can be cured by giving the patient food containing vitamin D, a product of peculiar value in strengthening weakness in the bones. Vitamin D can be made in the laboratory. Two grammes of it are equivalent to about one ton of cod liver oil in its power of curing or preventing rickets.

Besides prolonging life, chemical research has done a multitude of things to make life possible as we live it. The productivity of land and factory enables enough to be grown and manufactured to meet the needs of the greatly increased population of the world. Research is primarily responsible for this. Were it otherwise, we should be faced with the terror of world shortage piled on an economic crisis.

Poetry Found to Be True

"A rose by any other name would smell as sweet," said the poet, and tests in Germany have disclosed that even if the rose were artificial, it would be as attractive to the butterfly in its search for food. It is the color, and not the odor, that attracts, it has been found, the insects settling indiscriminately on paper and on real flowers that were scattered about a garden.—Exchange.

Obedience

The following is an incident that happened some years ago in India: A bachelor friend was giving a dinner party to some of his pals and their wives, and thought that wild duck would be a nice change. Instructions were duly given to the cook, and late that afternoon, when the host returned from his office, he found the cook busily chasing the wretched duck round and round the compound. Upon being asked why, the cook replied (after having safely caught the duck) that as he was unable to get a wild duck in the market, he had bought a tame one and was trying to make it wild by chasing it round the compound.—Exchange.

A Bright Light

It will be possible one day to see speech in the form of light, predicts a scientist. We understand that, when that day comes, all caddies will be supplied with smoked glasses.—London Humorist.

NOTICE TO MOP SALESMAN

They were visiting friends one evening. Presently their three-year-old son became restless. The hostess, noticing this, gave him a soft rubber ball to play with. During the course of his play the ball rolled under the davenport, and the little fellow crawled in after it. Presently the hostess asked him if he saw the ball.

He replied, "No."

"Then why don't you come out?"

"I'm drawing pictures on the floor."—Boston Transcript.

Sh-h-h!

A mother had just been telling her small son some of the "facts of life" and when she finished she said, "Now, son, are there any questions you would like to ask? Anything at all, don't be afraid."

After a little heavy thinking, he replied, "Well, yes, there is something I've been wanting to know for a long time." Her heart failed her as she asked him what it was.

"Mother, just how do they make bricks?"—Parents' Magazine.

Spool—"Did Mr. Scissors make any remarks?" Darning Cotton—"Yes, and very cutting ones."

His Purpose

One Sunday we took my little cousin, Armin, age four, to a restaurant to dinner. After the waitress brought the order, his mother asked him why he did not eat. Armin replied in a meek voice, "Mother, isn't this a restaurant?"

His mother answered, "Why, yes, of course."

"Well, then," said Armin, "I came here to rest."—Chicago Tribune.

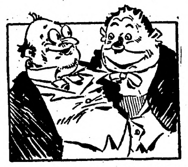
The Under Dog

Fritz (running after doctor)—Doctor, you must come back to our house. The front door has fallen down.

Doctor—That has nothing to do with me. You must go to the carpenter.

Fritz—But daddy is underneath the door.—Lustige Koelner Zeitung, Cologne.

LACKS FINISH



Man at Right—I'm a self-made man.

Man at Left—Don't brag, the job ain't completed yet.

Some Inducement

Visitor—And why do you want to be President when you grow up?

Tommy—So I won't hafta dig my bait when I go fishing.

Where He Spoiled It

"Rogers has an intelligent face. If he didn't say a word you'd know he was clever."

"Yes; but the trouble is he does."

Trying to Shift Attention

"Do you still trust the wisdom of the plain people?"

"Absolutely," answered Senator Sorghum. "But I haven't yet succeeded in getting the immense amount of mentality devoted to contract bridge to concentrate on my speeches."

"How is Morris getting on with his young wife?"

"Well, a month after the wedding a belated telegram of congratulations arrived and they refused to take it in."

But He Knows the Numbers

"I should think I have a good memory. I know all the telephone numbers in the town by heart."

"Impossible."

"Yes, they start at one and go to 9857, but I haven't the faintest idea to whom they belong."

All There Was to It

"I think this scenery is just heavenly."

"Um, I don't know. Take away the mountains and the lake and it's just like anywhere else."

Extinct Marsupial

Remains of the diprotodon, an extinct marsupial of the Pleistocene age that was almost as large as a small elephant, have been found in great abundance in certain dried-up salt lakes of the central and south Australian deserts. The kangaroos and wombats are the nearest living relatives of this animal, which, so far as is known, was the largest of the animals that carried their young in a pouch.

There is nothing to do with detestable weather but to stand it.

Mercolized Wax Keeps Skin Young

Get an ounce and use as directed. Fine particles of aged skin peel off until all defects such as pimples, liver spots, tan and freckles disappear. Skin is then soft and velvety. Your face looks years younger. Mercolized Wax brings out the hidden beauty of your skin. To remove wrinkles use one ounce Powdered Saxolite dissolved in one-half pint witch hazel. At drug stores.

If a million mothers had something to tell you

WOULD YOU LISTEN?

A MOTHER who has watched over her baby . . . day after day . . . thrilling to his every little gain . . . anxious about his smallest distress . . . Who can talk to you more understandingly than she? If a million such mothers could sit down with you now and tell you of their experience with a remarkable baby food—would you be interested?

Today, there are more than a million mothers who could tell you gladly, convincingly, of the wonderful things that Eagle Brand has done.

Year after year—by hundreds, by thousands—they write to The Borden Company, to tell their dramatic human stories. They tell of babies who grew and gained and flourished on Eagle Brand, with never a set-back. They tell of babies who have won blue ribbons and silver cups. They tell of babies—once failing, starving, because they could not digest other foods—brought back to full health by Eagle Brand. And often, they tell of handsome, healthy grown-up sons and daughters raised on Eagle Brand, and now giving this food to their babies.

FREE—helpful baby book for you. If you cannot nurse your baby, try Eagle Brand. See feeding directions on label. Send for "Baby's Welfare," containing feeding instructions, general information on baby care. We will gladly send your physician a report of the recent scientific feeding test of Eagle Brand.

Lending for Protection

Hollywood thought a certain motion picture star had gone crazy when he began to lend money to certain of his friends. To be sure, the amounts were small, but the fact that he lent any at all was cause for consternation among the people who knew him real well.

"Don't you worry," grinned the star, when it was pointedly suggested that he needed a vacation and mental relaxation. "I haven't loaned a dollar more than I'm willing to pay to feel certain that I'll be left strictly alone. No one comes near you when they owe you money."

Man Lost 26 Pounds Looks 100% Better

Feels Stronger Than Ever

Just to prove to any doubtful man or woman that Kruschen Salts is the SAFE way to reduce—let us take the letter of Mr. F. J. Fritz of Cincinnati, Ohio, recently received.

He writes: "I've tried extreme dieting, setting up exercises with very little results—but the results from Kruschen are almost incredible. In 3 months I reduced from 205 to 179 pounds and feel stronger than ever—no more wheezing or gasping for breath—friends say I look 100% better."

Bear in mind, you fat man, that there is danger in too much fat—try the safe way to reduce—one-half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water every morning—cut down on fatty meats and sweets—one bottle that lasts 4 weeks costs but a trifle—get it at any drugstore in the world.

Calamity

"Shower" in Philippines Holds World's Record

The heaviest 24-hour rainfall ever measured occurred at Baguio, the "summer capital" of the Philippines, in July, 1911.

Only brief accounts of it have been published until this year, when a detailed story of the shower and its effects was issued by Rev. Miguel Selga, director of the Philippine weather bureau, says Charles Fitzhugh Talman in his Science Service feature, "Why the Weather?"

"This torrential downpour attended the passage of a typhoon. More than 88 inches of rain fell during the four days, July 14-17, inclusive, the maximum fall in a 24-hour period being 46 inches from noon of the fourteenth to noon of the fifteenth.

"Two inches less than four feet of rain in 24 hours! This is more than falls in the whole of an average year at most places in the northeastern United States and Canada."—Literary Digest.

TRACE SOYBEAN TO ORIGIN IN ORIENT

Plant's Beginning Goes Back Thousands of Years.

The soybean, now a common crop on hundreds of farms, was discovered as a slender, twining vine thousands of years ago in eastern Asia, according to E. P. Reed, specialist in soils and farm crops for the agricultural extension service at the Ohio State university, who says that for centuries the farmers of Asia and parts of Europe have profited from domesticating and growing this humble plant as a crop.

Just as the wheat fields of ancient Babylon and Egypt made possible the rise of great civilizations with their contributions to world progress, so the soybean, long an outcast on American farms, had its birth in the remote days when history for the first time trod the stage of rich eastern empires.

In oriental countries, Reed states, soybeans have been and are still utilized largely for human consumption, because they contain a relatively high percentage of protein, which makes them an excellent substitute for meat.

Soybeans are utilized for many purposes. The threshed bean furnishes a valuable protein supplement in the grain ration for live stock. The hay is a splendid substitute for alfalfa and the clovers. There is an increasing demand for the extracted vegetable oil, the residue or pressed cake is used in mixed feeds. They also are grown with corn for silage. And, in addition, when the whole plant is plowed under as a green manure, they furnish a material rich in nitrogen that can be used to improve the soil.

The Milk War

Much attention has been given in the daily press about the milk war centering around Sioux City, Iowa. Some of the sentiment hereabouts favor the farmers, others call it a 'nuisance.'

To the latter, it is well to put the question: If this is a nuisance, what would you have the farmers around Sioux City do?

They, in common with all farmers, have been refused effective goverment aid—they have been told to "help themselves".

And now, when they are doing just that—helping themselves—just why should this action be condemned?

The farmer gets it in the neck whether he does something about his status or does nothing.

The Duck Season

The new open season for ducks, geese, brant and coot in Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Iowa, Montana, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Nebraska, will be from Oct. 1 to Nov. 30 this year. This extension of the season from one month to two months was made possible because of the increase in the number of waterfowl due to improved conditions concerning water supply in breeding grounds in the north central states and Canada.

Daily bag limits remain at 12 as provided by Minnesota statutes, except that the bag shall contain not more than 10 birds in the aggregate of canvasbacks, redheads, greater or lesser bluebills, ringnecks, bluewing, greenwing and cinnamon teal, gadwalls and shovellers. The season was closed on ruddy ducks and buffleheads, in addition to the wood-duck. The present noon opening hour was continued. Control of baiting, rest days, and other regulations were left to the individual states. W. T. Cox, Minnesota's Commissioner of Conservation, had hoped for a six weeks' open shooting season for migratory waterfowl. "However," he says, "Because of the feeling of satisfaction that is expressed by our sportsmen and conservationists, I approve of the new and prolonged season, which will do much to erase the keen disappointment encountered by our duck hunters last fall."

St. Hilaire Band Gave Concert

The St. Hilaire Juvenile Band motored up here last Thursday evening and gave a fine concert in the new village bandstand. About two hundred people turned out to hear the musical concert. Several auto loads of boosters from St. Hilaire also came up for the evening.

After the concert the band members were treated to lunch by the local commercial club.

Reduced Crews

The Great Northern has now reduced its section crews to one man besides the local foreman, at every station north along this line to Warroad.

We, as well as the railroad men, were led to believe that when all the workingmen agreed to take a 10 per cent. wage-cut the railroads offered them last spring, they would keep more men on the job this year and give those who only work during the summer a little longer time of employment.

What happened? The same old story. They hire, fire, and use the money that should go to the track maintenance worker, to pay dividends to millionaires.

Corn for Silage

The best stage at which to cut corn for silage and get the most feed value per acre is when the shuck first begins to turn yellow at the end of the ear and while the leaves are still green. The kernels should be dented and glazed.

Corn in the milk stage contains only about one-half the full feeding-value of the mature plant. When it is partly in the milk and partly glazed, or still not in the mature state, corn has 27 percent less feeding value than when at the proper stage of maturity to cut for silage.

Exam. Canceled

Acting Postmaster Gilbert Sanoden received the following letter from the U.S. Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C., the latter part of last week:

"Sir:

"The examination announced to be held for the position of postmaster at Holt, Minn., has been canceled, the Post Office Department having withdrawn its request for certification.

Please make public announcement of this cancellation and return to the Commission all supplies remaining in your possession. Very respectfully,

U. S. Civil Service Commission

Deferred until further advised by the Department.

Successful Festival

The Nazareth Lutheran Church Harvest Festival held at the F. K. Fredrickson home on Sunday was a big success. The big program rendered by local and out of town people was enjoyed very much by the large crowd which attended the annual festival.

Not only local folks come to enjoy the program and dinner at these annual festivals but, a lot of people from our neighboring villages and cities come to spend the day here.

In behalf of all those who took an active part in putting on the festival, the church council wishes to thank you all for coming here on Sunday. They especially thank Rev. Fjelstad and Rev. Pierce for their inspiring talks, the Community Band for the concert they gave; the Holt Male Quartette for the songs; the many committees for their work and cooperation and, those who donated the foods, hauling and otherwise helped to make the doing a big success.

The net proceeds of the day were $68.00 which was applied on local church budget for this year for which purpose it was raised.

Moves to Coppay Farm

Ludvig Sagstuen and family who have been farming the old Chris Norbeck place in Town of Mud Lake, have now moved onto the Frank Coppay farm south of town. Sagstuen purchased the quarter section from Coppay some time ago and is now busy fixing up the buildings for the winter.

Moves to Town

Ole Reierson has retired from active work on his farm southwest of town where he has been making his home for the past thirty-five years, and has now moved to town. He has rented the H. B. Young property here.

Mr. Reierson has rented out his farm, equipment and stock to his son Oscar, who was recently married.

Mrs. Hagberg Returns Home

Mrs. J. Hagberg returned to her home on Saturday after a long stay at the hospital and home of one of her daughters in Thief River Falls. She is now feeling pretty good but, is still in bed due to weakning from loss of blood when she got hurt some time ago.

C. A. Larson and family visited with relatives at Mentor over Sanday.

New Game Warden

Axel Nelson, district game warden, has received notice of his appointment as chief game warden in district No. 13, comprising Kittson, Roseau, Marshall, Lake of the Woods counties and that portion of Beltrami county lying north of Township 154. The promotion became effective the first of September.

Mr. Nelson's promotion is good news to his many friends over the district.

Asked about the opening of the chicken season, Mr. Nelson stated that the governor and the commissioner of conservation have no authority to open the season on prairie chickens this fall, so the season will remain closed. In some parts of the state there will be a few days' shooting of partridges, but that will not be effective in this section.

Thief Lake, in that part which is not designated a sanctuary, will be open for duck shooting. Some question as to permitting hunting of ducks in this lake has been raised. A number of sportsmen have argued that no shooting of ducks be allowed in the new reserve this fall. The ducks that have nested there have become very tame by reason of being fed by caretakers. Hunters going in there at the opening of the season, it is argued, will slaughter the ducks in big numbers before the birds become wild again.

Local sportsmen petitioned the conservation commission to open the season on chickens this fall, on the ground that an emergency existed. It was argued that the number of these birds had increased so much that the danger of inbreeding would work the same with these birds as is the case with rabbits when they become too numerous--they sicken and die. The sportsmen also argued that it is not the killing of birds by hunters that depletes the number of birds but natural enemies and weather conditions.

A change in game laws will likely be sought in the coming session of legislature by which local conditions will govern the taking of wild game rather than a fixed regulation for a statewide area.—Roseau Times.

To Have Auction Sale

Carl Sorenson, who for many years has been engaged in general farming on the old P. O. Reierson farm three miles west of here, has decided to quit that line of work and, has this week advertised all his personal property for sale at an auction to be held on Friday, Sept. 16.

Read his ad in this issue and watch for posters.

Oscar Hanson purchased a new Ford car, which was quite a swell layout at that time.

Jim Hill spoke at the RedLake county fair and drew a huge crowd, partly because a special train was put on from Warroad to Red Lake Falls.

Guy Anderson sustained a broken shoulder when his team ran away after being scared by the freight, which was switching in the yards here.

The primary election was to be held Tuesday, Sept. 17.

Earle Brown to Speak

Earle Brown, candidate for governor on the Republican ticket, will speak at Thief River Falls Wednesday evening, September 14. Several other prominent Republican candidates for state and national office will also appear on the program which will be held at the Auditorium commencing at 8 p. m., Sept. 14.

Schooltime Again

The local school opened its doors here again on Tuesday for the 1932-'33 term of nine months with the same faculty as last year in charge. They are:

E. O. Nybakken, Drayton, N Dak., Superintendent.

Miss Edith Anderson, St. Peter, Minn., High School Principal.

Alfred N. Sather, Fargo, 6th, 7th and 8th grades.

Miss Jeanette Lanman, McIntosh, Minn., 3d, 4th and 5th grades.

Miss Eunice Johnson, Newfolden, Minn., 1st and 2d grades.

This makes the third year that Miss Anderson and Miss Lanman are on the local faculty.

It puts a lot of life into the small town when school opens and the youngsters start to sprint around, all in a hurry to get back to school to learn something new. It also adds to our pleasures and social gatherings to have the teachers and pupils take part in all the doings during the winter months.

About eighty-six pupils were enrolled in the grades and thirty-six in high school but, Mr. Nybakken announced that he expected more students to enroll in high school within the next few days.

We extend a welcome hand to the entire faculty and hope that you will enjoy your work among us here.

Sam Lorentson and family visited with the Walter Larson family at Bronson on Sunday.

S. E. Reierson and family of Grygla were here Sunday visiting relatives and taking in the harvest festival.

Christianity?

(An Editorial)

The way some people harp on a sermon after they finally get to church to hear one, puts us in mind of the fellow that ran so short of stuff to say about his fellowmen that he went to church just to hear if the minister had anything to say about anyone so he, in turn, could make up a story of it and peddle it as free gossip. Now some of those whom we know, and who claim to be good Christians here, are doing that class of stuff, and if that is Christianity, it certainly has a stronghold in this community.

Here's a good rule to follow while attending church: If there is anything about a sermon that you don't get clearly, wait until after the services and ask your pastor just what he meant so you won't take the subject up wrong.

Band Concert

The Holt 30 Piece Community Band will give a public concert at the village bandstand Thursday evening, Sept. 15 at 8 p. m. Everybody welcome.

Band rehearsal at the regular hour Tuesday evening.

Saturday Afternoon Holiday

Due to the fact that the managers of the Marshall County State Bank here and the Farmers State Bank at Middle River are working in the institutions alone, they have agreed jointly to close at noon on Saturdays so as to have a little time to go out and attend to other business details. Usually before they would not close on Saturday afternoons after Sept. 1, but as they are not hiring any clerks they find no other time to take half a day off for business outside the institutions.

Olaf Ness, manager at the Math Barzen Cooperative Elevator, shipped out the first car of grain for this year on Saturday when he loaded out a car of flax.

Notice to the Public

The Farmers State Bank of Middle River and the Marshall County State Bank of Holt will continue to close on Saturday afternoons.

Banking hours on Saturday will be from 9:00 a. m. to 12:00 noon until further notice.

—12—

Out of his eyes the tenderness died. They grew hard and cold as ice. Involuntarily he straightened his shoulders. Then he sat down on the edge of the cot to wait.

Wilson stopped in the doorway of the office, taken by surprise. The woman he saw was not the one he had expected to see.

Ann Gifford, pallid to the lips, came forward eagerly.

"Can you save him?" she asked.

"We'll try," he promised.

"He didn't do it. I did. I can't let them kill him. It's awful." Her eyes closed for a moment, so that he thought she was going to faint. But she caught at the back of a chair and steadied herself. "I want to give myself up. If they must hang somebody, why—"

The young man's eyes picked up two others in the room, Jim Yerby and Phil Stark. He passed the question of her guilt as immaterial for the moment. The mob was in a hanging temper and would disregard any evidence she might offer, no matter whether true or false.

"You boys here to help Mike?" he asked crisply.

"Tha's whatever, Wils," Yerby answered promptly for both.

"Good." Wilson turned to Mike. "If Miss Gifford's story satisfies you, why don't you turn Stone over to me as deputy to slip him outa town? I'll be responsible for him."

The jailer rasped his chin dubiously. "That ain't a bad idea either, if it's not too late. You mean for the rest of us to stay an' hold the jail."

"Make a bluff at it, yes."

"Question is, have they got the jail surrounded? They've got a dozen men with rifles strung out in front." This came from Phil.

"I just got in the back way, by the creek bed," Wilson said. "But we'll have to hurry. Get Stone, Mike—an' don't waste a second."

The Irishman nodded and left the room almost on the run.

To young Stark his inherited enemy gave orders. "Get Miss Gifford away from here. I'll have Mike let you out the front door. There won't be any trouble with the guards outside. They'll let you through, except maybe to ask some questions. Take her to the hotel. If yore sister isn't there they will know where she is at. Get hold of my brother Lyn an' tell him to come up the creek with what men he has gathered. When we hear an owl hoot twice we'll know he's there an' open the back door for him."

Ann demurred. "I don't want to go. I'd rather stay here so I can go out and tell the mob he didn't do it. I mean, if you and he don't get away."

"That would sure do a lot of good, about as much as tryin' to persuade a hungry tiger not to make its kill," Wilson scoffed. His harsh voice softened. "If you want to help, there's a way. Go to the hotel and tell yore story. Or wherever Miss Stark is now. She's likely gathered a few good citizens. Stir 'em up to help."

"Well," she agreed doubtfully.

Rand came into the room with Stone. The prisoner's face was hard and impassive as rim-rock. He looked round the room and nodded to those present.

"Ready?" asked Wilson.

The deputy sheriff handed a revolver to Stone. "Me, I believe this young lady's story. But I'm askin' you to give yoreself up whenever Hank calls for you, Dave."

Out of His Eyes the Tenderness Died. They Grew Hard and Cold as Ice.

"Yes," the Texan promised.

Rand led the way to the back door through the corridor. He unlocked the heavy door and stepped outside. A bullet flattened itself against a boulder two feet from him.

"Nothing doing, Mike," a voice called from the brush across the creek. "We've got you covered good an' plenty."

The deputy stepped back into the corridor and closed the door. "Too late. They'd get you both sure," he said.

"Yes," agreed McCann. "No chance."

They returned to the office. "They're watchin' the back way," Rand explained. "Now what about Miss Gifford? Do you reckon she had ought to go?"

Stone and McCann answered "Yes," simultaneously.

"The sooner the quicker," Yerby added.

"We'll call out first an' tell those in front she is coming, so there won't be any chance for a mistake," McCann said.

Ann looked piteously at the Texan and followed Mike without a word of protest. Her heroic gesture to save the man who had come to play so large a part in her life was under a veto of general masculine opinion. No doubt their view was a commonsense one, that the mob would listen to no explanation she made, but none the less she longed to try what still seemed to her the only simple way that might save bloodshed.

To the watchers outside, the deputy sheriff explained in a shout that a woman was leaving the jail accompanied by a friend.

"Let 'em come straight down the walk an' we'll meet 'em both, Mike," some one answered. "Hands in the air all the time an' no shenanigan. We're not takin' chances."

Phil and Ann were let out and the door locked behind them.

Hands up, they moved forward to meet the guards. The man in charge of the jail blockade did not intend to let any trick be played upon him. He had heard of prisoners escaping dressed as women.

When he recognized Ann he took his hat off. But he held her for a short examination.

"What you been doing there, ma'am?" he asked.

"I went to give myself up. This afternoon I heard Mr. Stone had been arrested for killing Tom McArdle. I shot him myself."

The man laughed, grimly. "That's a new play, hidin' behind a woman. I wouldn't hardly have expected that of Dave Stone."

"But that isn't true," Ann cried. "I did shoot him. Jasper Stark and that Gitner saw me riding away afterward. Ask them. They can't deny it."

"We can't ask them. They've lit out somewhere, an' that's funny, too. Know anything about it?" he asked suspiciously.

"No. But it's true. Mr. Stone hadn't anything to do with shooting Tom McArdle. I did it. I shot him because—because of what he did to my sister. I was coming home from one of our camps when I met him. He tried to make up to me, so he could come and see—come and visit at the house. We quarreled—and I shot him. You don't believe me, and it's the truth before God," she cried desperately.

"No, ma'am, we don't believe you. We think you're tryin' to save Dave Stone," the leader said, not unkindly "No man confesses to a killing he didn't do. That wouldn't be reasonable. We'll tell Dave you done yore best for him. If you'll take my advice you'll light right outa town. It's no place for you tonight."

He turned to Phil. "Who's up at the jail with Rand? Anybody else at all?"

"Four others."

"Who?"

Phil looked him hardily in the eye. "I've forgot their names."

"Meanin' you won't tell?"

"Meanin' just that."

There was a short silence. "How come you mixed in this, Stark?"

"If Dave killed McArdle it was in a fair fight an' he was justified. I know that. Dave never shot anyone without givin' him a chance."

"He's just a kid, Phil is," someone spoke up. "You know how kids are about gunmen."

"I wouldn't call Dave a gunman exactly," Phil protested. "He's absolutely square—an' he's game."

Ann broke down and between her sobs begged for the life of her friend. She kept repeating that Stone did not kill McArdle, that she had done it herself, that he was sacrificing himself because he was trying to protect her. The net result of her passionate entreaty was that in their minds she convicted herself only of being in love with the Texan.

Phil escorted her, still shaken with sobs, to the hotel. They passed groups of hurrying, excited men. The question they heard repeated several times was as to what had become of Jasper Stark and Gitner.

Ann found the hotel a nucleus of activity for the few who opposed mob law. Julia was here, and Sam Sharp and Lyn McCann. But the leader was a lean grizzled brown man, a trifle bow-legged, with hard eyes and shaggy brows. Peter McCann had been enlisted by Julia to support his son Wilson. With sharp incisive questions he drew from Phil the situation at the jail.

"You say yore brother an' Gitner are there, too?" he asked after the boy had told the facts.

"Yes, as prisoners." Phil answered a little sulkily. He did not enjoy surrendering command to these McCanns, as he had been forced to do both at the jail and here. "Yore son got 'em there somehow. Arrested the two of 'em, one at a time."

"Walked into their crowd an' took them away?" asked Peter incredulously. "He couldn't do it. No single man could."

"All right. He didn't do it, then," snapped the boy. "All I know is that Mike Rand says he did an' claims to have Jas an' Gitner locked up in cells for inciting riot."

Peter's eyes were shining. If this was true—if Wilson really had carried through this cutting out adventure and arrested the leaders of the mob—he certainly would be proud of his boy.

Ann had been talking to Julia, who now interrupted McCann by leading the owner of the sheep ranch to him.

"Do you know Miss Gifford, Mr. McCann?" she said by way of interruption. "She has something to tell you."

Again Ann told her story of the trouble with McArdle that had led to his death. McCann listened and believed. It was possible that Stone's story was true, too. Perhaps she had missed the range rider and he had been killed later in a fight with the Texan. Or perhaps, which was just as likely, the little gunman had made up the story to protect her. In any event, it was clear to him that Tom McArdle had earned his doom and that he had not been murdered but shot down after due warning.

There were half a dozen men in the room in addition to Phil and the owner of the Flying VY. To them Peter gave instructions.

"There's two ways of doing this job, boys. One is for us to get inside the jail an' stand off the mob. We can do it, but there might be bloodshed. The other way is for me to step in an' take the leadership in this job. That last is how it will be. You boys will sift in among the crowd an' talk me up as boss of this rodeo. They're millin' around out thar and don't hardly know where they're at now Jas Stark an' Gitner have gone. So I'll take charge. When I make a play you back it strong."

"But—what are you going to do?" Julia asked.

Peter looked at her, flushed and bright-eyed and quivering with life. She was a lovely picture of youth, and at sight of it his eyes for a moment played tricks with him. The girl he saw was the one he had loved and lost twenty-odd years before.

"I'm figurin' on playing their game. But we'll change it some. We'll be vigilantes and not lynchers. That calls for a trial. Don't you worry, Jessie. It'll work out fine."

Julia understood now, when inadvertently he had called her by her mother's name, much that had puzzled her in Peter McCann's attitude. In his eyes, while he had been staying at the Circle Cross, she had more than once seen an expression she could not fathom. But she knew now what it had meant. She was very like her mother, and when he looked at her the hatred for her family was no longer in his heart. The memory of Jessie Farwell made it impossible.

"Can you save him that way?" Ann asked.

"If you'll come through with yore story clean, if you'll tell what Tom McArdle did to ruin the lives of yore family."

Ann shrank back, white-faced and trembling. "I couldn't—before everybody."

"Just enough so they'd understand," he said gently.

Julia put her arms around the other girl. "I'll be with you, Ann," she whispered. And to McCann she said: "Leave it to me."

The old cattleman nodded. He judged her competent to handle that end of the situation.

CHAPTER XI

Dunwig's Park

Mesa boasted a band of six pieces, called upon for music on all patriotic occasions such as ball games and Fourth of July celebrations. The man who played the big drum was Medford, clerk at Basford's emporium. Him the owner of the Flying VY pressed into service.

They repaired to the steps of the courthouse.

"Let her go, son," McCann ordered. "Kinda slow an' steady."

With heavy measured strokes Medford beat the drum. The sound of it filled the night. It arrested the attention of every man and every group within hearing. All knew it was a call to gather for concerted action. Within three minutes the courthouse square was full.

The slow reverberation of the drum died down. Peter McCann began to speak. The gift of winning an audience was native to him, perhaps inherited from the ancestors who had come across from the Emerald isle.

Before he had been speaking three minutes he was not only one of the mob but its accepted leader. His assumption, to begin with, was that Stone must pay the penalty of his crime. But Mesa was, he claimed, a law-abiding community. It did not intend that killers should come in and shoot down its citizens. All it wanted was to make sure of the fact before it proceeded to summary justice. To that end a court must be organized and the accused man tried. If he was found guilty of dry-gulching Tom McArdle, of murdering him without giving the range rider a chance for his life, he ought to be executed promptly.

"What's the sense in wastin' time on a trial when he admits he did it?" a voice shouted. "We'll hang him first an' you can try him afterward."

"Come up here, Kelly Brown," the big voice of McCann boomed. "Don't hide back there, but come up and tell me that to my face."

The man was hustled forward, against his desire. He was one of the hangers-on at Pedro's place, and his reputation was not good.

Peter caught him by the arm and dragged him up to the top step. "Now tell us yore idea of what's the right thing to do," he ordered.

"Well, he's guilty, ain't he? What's the use oratin' about it?"

"I'm talkin' about a trial. You say hang him first an' try him afterward. Is that giving him a square deal?"

"Did he give poor Tom a square deal?" the man asked doggedly.

"That's what we're here to find out. How about the time you were arrested for blotting the Circle Lazy H brand? Would you have enjoyed being hung first an' tried afterward?"

A laugh went up at Brown's expense. "Better give him a trial, I reckon," he conceded sullenly, caught in a trap from which there was no escape.

When McCann appealed to the amused crowd a few moments later his suggestion was carried by a large vote. After all, there would be more entertainment in trying the Texan before they hanged him.

A committee was appointed to guard the prisoner when he should be brought out, after which Peter McCann went to the jail alone, waving a white handkerchief.

The deputy sheriff admitted him. McCann followed the officer to the room where Stone, Yerby, and Wilson were waiting. He explained the facts briefly.

Rand shook his head. "No, sir, I ain't givin' up my prisoner to be tried by any mob. If you want him you'll have to come an' take him."

"How about it?" asked the ranchman, appealing to Stone. "I named the committee that will guard you. Good men, all of 'em. They'll stand put. Question is, have you got a case good enough to stand a fair trial? But I'll tell you this straight: it's that or lynching, and you take yore choice."

"I killed him because he needed killing. I'm willing to stand trial on it any time. Tha's why I gave myself up," the Texan said quietly.

"Seems to be up to you, then, Mike," the older McCann said bluntly. "Will you bring him out for trial? Or shall we break in an' get him."

The deputy surrendered. "All right. I'll bring him out, but I'll be beside him all the time."

A huge bonfire had been lit in the square and by the light of it Stone was tried. Fletcher, the only lawyer in the town, acted as judge after a formal protest against vigilante proceedings. A cattleman named Haskell prosecuted. Peter McCann called upon someone to offer himself as attorney for the defendant.

After a pause his son Wilson spoke. "I reckon I'm no lawyer, but if Dave will stand for me I'll do my best."

The Texan nodded imperturbably. "Suits me."

There were only five witnesses. Jasper Stark and Gitner, released from solitary confinement, told of finding the body and of Stone's suspicious actions. Wilson cross-examined them very briefly, asking the same questions of each.

"Did you mention yore suspicions to anyone then or later?"

Both of the witnesses remembered one or two to whom they had spoken their doubts, but the persons named were hangers-on at Pedro's place, loafers of no reputation in the community.

"If you thought Stone killed Tom why did you tell Sheriff Le Page about Miss Gifford?" young McCann asked Jasper.

"I figured she might be in it with him. I hadn't a thing to go on but suspicions," he growled.

"Have you anything more to go on now?"

"He up an' confessed, didn't he?"

"We'll hear his story. I'm askin' you for yours now," Wilson cut back curtly.

"Well, he'd told us he was allowin' to bump off Tom on account of being jealous of him."

"When did he tell you that?"

"Several times."

"Who was present when he told it?"

"Carl Gitner."

"Anybody else?"

"Not far's I recollect."

"What did he say he was jealous about?"

"About Tom's stand-in up at the sheep ranch."

Jasper's manner was sulky and unconvincing.

"Did you or didn't you tell the sheriff your suspicions about Stone."

"No, I didn't," snarled the badgered man. "Tell you I hadn't a thing to go on but suspicions."

"How come you to wait nearly three months before you told the sheriff about meetin' Miss Gifford near the scene of the killing?"

"I hated to bring her name into it, she being a woman."

Wilson had talked with his father a few minutes while the jury was being chosen. Roughly he knew the facts as to Jasper's relations with the Gifford sisters.

"Now Tell Us Yore Idea of What's the Right Thing to Do," He Ordered.

"Ever have any trouble with Miss Gifford?" he demanded.

The witness hesitated. "Well, she didn't like it when I said I reckoned I'd have to tell what I knew."

"Did she order you off the place and tell you never to show up there again?"

"She was some excited. I won't say she acted friendly."

Young McCann moved a step closer. He waited a moment, to give full effect to his question. "Did you tell the Gifford girls that unless Miss Ethel would marry you her sister would have to go to the penitentiary?"

"No, sir," blustered Stark. "I never said any such a thing. If they claim I did—"

"Never mind that." Again Wilson waited for absolute silence before he spoke. He was sending a shot in the dark, but he guessed shrewdly it would strike home. "Is there any reason why you an' Gitner want Stone outa the way, any reason why you're afraid of him, anything he knows you're scared he might tell?"

Jasper's jaw dropped. For a moment he stared at his questioner. Apparently he felt the impression his near-collapse had made, for he tried to strengthen his denial by iteration. "Why no, w-what do you mean? I—I—we ain't scared of him tellin' a thing. If he claims he's got a thing on me he's a liar."

McCann's next question seemed to be far afield, but nothing he could have asked would have so startled the crowd with a sense of impending drama. The words of the sentence seemed almost to be spaced in their measured evenness.

"Were you and Gitner together between ten an' eleven o'clock on the morning when yore father was killed?"

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Bermudians Still Seek Spanish Treasure Trove

Spanish treasure may yet be found in the Bermuda islands if ancient records and traditions still current among the people are to be believed. Most of it must have been buried prior to 1609, when the islands were colonized, at the time when Spanish ships, both pirate and authorized, were carrying stores of wealth from Central and South America.

The early settlers in Bermuda were considerably excited over the possibility of recovering some of the gold, and in 1693 made a determined effort to discover it. Several witnesses before the governor spoke of remembering a triangular heap of stones on one of the outlying islands and a yellow tree to which an engraved brass plate was affixed, while others testified to a wooden cross which pointed toward a mysterious stone pile. One man swore on oath that he had seen a phantom ship cross the harbor and that "fire drakes" had alighted upon it. An earlier governor had attempted to find the treasure with the aid of a mystic white stone, but the expedition's work was stopped because some of the citizens "thought it not lawful to find it that way." Somewhat later a Bermudian purchased a whole island from the proprietors of the Bermuda company with a lump of ambergris, because he was sure that he had located the treasure trove. And Bermudians still call a certain point Moneypiece rock, because several strange coins had been found near the spot.

Loose Language

Recently a public speaker preparing to make an accusation about something of which he was ignorant began with the statement: "I venture the assertion." There is a phrase contradictory in its very make-up. An assertion is a positive affirmation. It is not a suggestion, a probability, a possibility or remote contingency; so it is not a venture into the realms of doubt—a mere personal and prejudiced opinion. Yet whenever one "ventures the assertion" he is getting ready, nine times out of ten, to make a wild and unfair speculation. He is merely expressing an unsupported opinion in a noncommittal way. It is a funny phrase, and it ought to be abolished for incompetency.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Sleepy Motorists

There is much all-night driving on the Connecticut highways, particularly by persons traveling between Boston and New York. Because there have been a number of serious accidents attributable to the operator of a vehicle going to sleep at the wheel, state police have adopted a plan of halting late-night travelers. The policeman asks the driver if he is sleepy and wants to take a nap. If the motorists says he would appreciate a rest period of a half-hour or so, the motor cycle officer tells him to pull well over to the side of the road and go to sleep, assuring the driver he will be called at the time he specifies.

Blouse for a Bride

One cotton blouse is the price of a wife in the land of the head-hunting Jivaros at the Brazilian head-waters of the Amazon, according to Dr. Mathew W. Sterling, just returned from that country. But, he explains, the amorous bridegroom must make the blouse himself, spinning the cotton and weaving it so carefully that one item of apparel sometimes requires many months of work. The women wear a blouse and skirt, and the men wear skirts and nothing else. These, also, they weave themselves, and wash once a day.

Puzzle for Archeologists

Archeologists unearthing the ruins of Ur of the Chaldees discovered a coffin filled with strangely marked lumps of baked clay. The bones had been removed from the coffin and it was filled with the clay lumps, each marked with the impression of a priceless gem. The gems were beautifully cut, the report said, and were in a style in vogue during the reign of the great Persian emperor, Darius, in the Fiftieth century B. C. A picture on one of the gems depicts the monarch strangling a lion.

"Jail was the most attractive place I've seen since I left," he told the warden, "and that's why I came back."

Brazil Spurns "Baby" Cars

Autoists in Brazil are not interested in "baby" cars. Neither do they care for automobiles from the United Kingdom, according to a report of the commercial secretary at Rio de Janeiro to the British department of overseas trade. The antipathy is due to the fact that local distributors of British cars went out of business after a few months or a year, and left their clients without service.

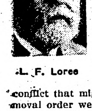
Mayor Walker Presents His Defense—Progress of the Mid-West Farmers' Strike—Business Conference Opened by President Hoover.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

MAYOR JAMES J. WALKER opened his defense before Governor Roosevelt, and numerous witnesses were called to testify to the purity of his actions and motives. At the beginning of the week Walker's chief counsel, John J. Curtin, closed his plea to Supreme Court Justice Staley to halt the removal proceedings, and with what seems to be his usual lack of tact wound up with the statement: "We can only go to court to avoid a physical conflict that might well ensue if a removal order were made without jurisdiction." Henry Epstein of the attorney general's staff challenged the authority of the court to limit the governor's power.



L. F. Loree

The mayor's first witnesses were the members of the city taxi board of control; one of them being L. F. Loree, president of the Delaware and Hudson railroad. He and his colleagues testified that Walker did not attempt in any way to limit the number of cabs after the bond transaction with J. A. Sisto which is the basis of one of Mr. Seabury's most serious charges. Four independent taxicab operators were called and swore the board of control had not tried to create a monopoly for the larger companies.

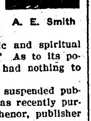
Paul Block, the newspaper publisher, was a loyal and stubborn witness for the mayor. Concerning their joint stock account, he testified that each took $102,000 from it in one year, and he told the governor that he never entertained the thought that his personal or business friendship for the mayor might be used to trade for "favors." Governor Roosevelt's questioning brought forth illuminating testimony regarding $140,000 that Mr. Block had put into a tile manufacturing concern in which Senator John J. Hastings, another of the Walker group, owned a large interest. It was brought out that none of the tile ever was sold to the city. It was also shown that if the plans to manufacture the tile had not been dropped the city would have been interested in the product.

Walker's claim has been that the entire investigation was inspired by the Republicans to embarrass the Democratic party in the November election. In the attempt to bolster up this claim he summoned eight Republican state leaders, at the head of the list being W. Kingsland Macy, state chairman.

The governor, however, blocked this move by refusing to hear testimony regarding the motives of the legislators who ordered the investigation that resulted in the charges against the mayor.

The hearing has taken much more time than had been expected, so the governor decided on night sessions.

ALFRED E. SMITH, whilom national leader of the Democratic party, is now an editor. When the Outlook, now re-named the New Outlook, resumes publication on October 1 Al will be filling the editorial chair, once occupied by Theodore Roosevelt. In his announcement of the fact he said he would carry on the traditions of Roosevelt and strive to make the magazine "a platform for the free and liberal expression of progressive thought on the economic, civic and spiritual problems of the day." As to its political complexion he had nothing to say.



A. E. Smith

The Outlook, which suspended publication last spring, was recently purchased by Frank Tichenor, publisher of the Spur, Aero Digest and other magazines. It was founded by Henry Ward Beecher in 1869 and has included among its editors Lyman Abbott as well as Theodore Roosevelt. Four years ago it was combined with the Independent, which was founded by H. C. Bowen as an anti-slavery organ.

FARMERS of the Middle West were meeting with considerable success in their "strike" designed to force produce prices to higher levels. The movement, which started in Iowa, spread to other states, and two victories were scored in Nebraska where milk producers gained higher prices.

At Omaha officials of the Iowa-Nebraska Co-Operative Milk association consented to pay $2 per hundredweight for milk, compared with a previous figure of $1.45, while at Lincoln milk dealers agreed to pay $1.80, an increase of 40 cents over the previous figure.

More than 1,000 agriculturists were assembled in camps along the main highways leading into Omaha, but there were reports that some of the picketers were in a dispute as to the best method of enforcing the farmers' "holiday."

Despite warnings from federal officials, the farmers in several instances interfered with rail shipments of live stock in Iowa and Nebraska. Wisconsin and Minnesota dairymen were planning meetings to decide whether or not to join in the strike.

Tear bombs came into use at Council Bluffs, Iowa, when sheriffs' deputies employed them to scatter a crowd of 1,000 farm "strikers" and spectators who were blocking a highway. Each trucker en route to market was given a deputy escort and no violence resulted.

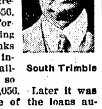
WHEN the White House conference on business and industry opened Friday with more than one hundred prominent men in attendance, President Hoover started the proceedings with a statement outlining the scope of the parley. He proposed several specific lines of action. One aims to bring about increased employment and includes the five-day week, though Mr. Hoover did not recommend its adoption universally. A second deals with easier and cheaper credit for certain industries that have not benefited by the loosening up that already has taken place. A third proposition is to seek better credit facilities for marketing of farm products and live stock, both in the United States and abroad.

Other speakers of the opening day were: Secretary of the Treasury Mills, Gov. Eugene Meyer of the federal reserve board, Chairman Atlee Pomerene of the Reconstruction Finance corporation, Secretary of Commerce Ralph D. Chapin, Chairman Franklin W. Fort of the home loan bank board and Paul Bestor, farm loan commissioner.

It was decided that small committees should handle each specific problem of economic inertia, and that after the close of the conference the plans it may develop shall be given effect by local subcommittees.

Officials predicted that as a result of the conference a central or executive committee will be formed to include the biggest bankers and business men of the country. This body, they pointed out, may unify the activities of the business and industrial committees of the 12 federal reserve districts and become the spearhead of the recovery drive.

SOUTH TRIMBLE, clerk of the house of representatives, made good his promise and gave to the public a statement of the transactions of the Reconstruction Finance corporation from July 21 to July 31 inclusive. During those eleven days, the directors of the corporation authorized 437 new loans aggregating $45,057,556, and increases of former loans totaling $1,653,500 to banks and other credit institutions and to railroads. The total so loaned was $46,711,056. Later it was revealed that some of the loans authorized to banks had not been drawn upon.



South Trimble

Chairman Steagall of the house banking committee said he believed the publicity given the loans would tend to strengthen the confidence of depositors in the banks concerned.

Mr. Trimble was accused by Congressman Treadway of Massachusetts of acting as he did in order to gain favor with Speaker Garner, who advocated publicity for the reports. In reply the house clerk said this charge was ridiculous and that he acted on the legal advice of his son, who held the law gave him no discretion in the matter.

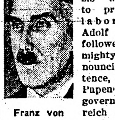
CONGRESSMAN SHANNON'S committee investigating the results of federal competition with private concerns in business went to South Bend, Ind., and there heard a lot more complaints against Uncle Sam as a trader. Manufacturers, business men and representatives of various industries declared they were being pushed to the wall through competition from government boards and bureaus that are financed by taxpayers' money. Their wail was presented by the Federation of American Business, and the lines of competition ran all the way from pickles and rubber stamps to department stores, wheat, coffee and cotton.

The Association of Railway Executives presented a brief attacking the Inland Waterways corporation, the government barge line that operates on the Mississippi, Illinois and Warrior rivers. The railway men argued that the government should get rid of the barge line as an unfair competitor of the rails.

Manufacturers in Illinois presented a brief giving specific lines in which competition by the government is reducing their business, cutting into the normal revenues, reducing their pay rolls and number of employees, meanwhile piling up the tax burden. One item of complaint is the growth of prison industries.

F. TRUBEE DAVISON, assistant secretary of war, has announced that he is a candidate for the gubernatorial nomination at the New York state Republican convention. The announcement followed formal notification to him that the executive committee of Nassau county Republican committee had adopted a resolution pronouncing him the candidate of the Nassau county Republicans.

PROSPECTS for civil war in Germany were heightened when a court at Beuthen, Upper Silesia, sentenced five National Socialists to death in connection with the killing of a Communist. Seven other Nazis were sentenced to prison at hard labor. Immediately Adolf Hitler and his followers arose in mighty wrath, denouncing the sentence, Chancellor Von Papen and the entire government of the reich and demanding pardon for the five. There were riotous demonstrations in Beuthen and other places, with attacks on Jews and Socialists, and the police and more conservative Nazi leaders had a hard time curbing the enraged Hitlerites.



Franz von Papen

Hitler issued a statement declaring the condemned men to be "martyrs" and assuring them that their freedom "from this minute is a question of our honor." He added: "It is our duty to battle the government which made this monstrous blood sentence possible. Heaven may send us torture upon torture, but the National Socialist movement will soon be able to finish this guillotine government led by Von Papen."

To meet the storm of protest and denunciation, the governments of the reich and of Prussia issued a joint manifesto that made it plain Von Papen's cabinet would not tolerate any revolt against the laws of the reich. It declared that the severest penalties would be invoked against "every lawbreaker, regardless of person or party," and that the government would yield to no political pressure in considering the cases of the five condemned men.

PERHAPS the best piece of news of the week was the announcement by Myron C. Taylor, chairman of the board of the United States Steel corporation, that it would immediately spend $5,000,000 for replacements and new equipment. The expenditures are to be made in the corporation's plants in Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Alabama and Pennsylvania.

"It would seem the buying movement cannot long be delayed," said Mr. Taylor, and his further remarks indicated that the directors of the huge corporation believe it is now safe for them to plan for better times in the industrial world.

On the other hand, a "sour note" is injected in the chorus of hope by a group of eminent engineers known as Technocracy who for more than ten years have been analyzing the American industrial and social system under the auspices of Columbia university. These men, using a yardstick called "energy production," have concluded that industry has reached the point of efficiency where further expansion is virtually impossible and where the creation of debt on an already overladen structure has passed its period of growth. They predict 20,000,000 unemployed within two years if a downward trend of basic commodities and services continues, and consider futile such efforts at resuscitation as the five-day week, the Reconstruction Finance corporation and low-cost housing schemes.

Technological efficiency, they hold, has increased production to such an extent that employment—no matter how many new industries are initiated—will continue its steady decrease from the peak of 1918, while the total debt claim against the physical equipment of all American industry has risen to "the fantastic figure at $218,000,000,000—a debt claim on posterity."

LONDON again hears that the prince of Wales is going to take a bride, and again the rumor is that the lady chosen is Princess Ingrid of Sweden. The prince is to open a British exhibition at Copenhagen on September 24, and he is to attend the wedding of Prince Gustaf of Sweden at Coburg on October 20. Between those dates, according to the unconfirmed story, he will pay a visit to Stockholm, and it is expected the marriage will then be arranged.

Prince of Wales

The prince of Wales was thirty-eight years old last June. Ingrid, a pretty blond, is twenty-two. She is distantly related to the prince and is a frequent visitor in London, where she is often the guest of the British royal family. She is also one of the most eligible of the princesses in Europe.

CAPT. JAMES A. MOLLISON of Great Britain put his little Moth plane down at Roosevelt field, New York, and went on record as the first person to make the solo flight westward across the Atlantic. His start was from Ireland and he landed first forty miles from St. John, N. B. He planned to fly back to Ireland as soon as the weather was propitious.

CAPITAL AS MECCA TO TOURIST HOSTS

Washington Most Popular of All Resorts.

The most popular tourist resort in the United States is the city of Washington, according to statistics gathered by travel bureaus and makers of motor maps. And the spots in Washington which attract the largest number of sightseers are the Lincoln memorial, White House and the Washington monument.

Washington is so full of sights of historical, architectural and national interest that it is practically impossible for any visitor to see them all in less than a fortnight. No city in the world has so many guide books, and they are in general so well prepared that the visitor can seek out the city's wealth of monuments and public buildings without difficulty.

"No visitor is likely to miss the Lincoln memorial dreaming in stately peace beside its reflecting pool," declares a writer in the Woman's Home Companion, "nor the noble directness of the great shaft of the Washington monument, with its austerity and uncluttered beauty. And no American can stand before the White House without feeling that this unpretentious frame building is a happy instance of the Eighteenth-century democracy that was so sternly turning away from the florid courts of the Old world they were rejecting."

Washington is a city of anomalies. Not an old city, even as American cities go, it yet embodies in its public buildings so much of what the brilliant statesmanship of the early Republic stood for and accomplished that one feels there almost more than anywhere else in our country the hovering forms from a great past.

A city without industries, it is still a city full of people who work. Too far south for rigorous northern winters, though too northern to be outside the freezing zone, its climate is hospitable to a wealth of flowers, plants and trees that impress the visitor as being greater in variety than any he sees elsewhere. Though it is the Capital of a nation its citizens cannot vote. Situated in no state, adjacent to two, it is an entity in itself unlike any other world capital.

Too Big for Comfort

When Fraulein Brunhilde, the German giantess, was in London some years ago she never dared go out for a walk, because at once a crowd collected to stare up at her. She was very nearly eight feet high. She could not get into a taxi and could only travel in a specially made motor car. Life, she explained, was "one continual bending."

"The Cathedral of the Movies"

NEW YORK, long our greatest theatrical center, has now gone in for great movie palaces and capped the climax recently when the largest and most unique film parlor in the world was opened.

Built of stone, terra cotta and brick, it is approximately 200 feet square, 115 feet high, seats 6,000 persons—the foyer, accommodating 4,000 more, can be emptied in three minutes, and cost about $8,000,000.

The organ has three consoles, providing for a range of musical production which probably never before was attempted on any organ. In addition to the consoles, the orchestra pit accommodates 110 musicians and disappears mechanically.

The comfort of the visitor seems ever to have been in mind when the plans were made. There is more room between the seats; from every orchestra seat one looks down on the stage without having to crane his neck; a patented effect makes the figures on the screen "stand out;" the auditorium is lighted by reflection from the stage, even while films are being shown and the entire interior is done in one color, gold, which makes for both beauty and restful eyes; special ventilating appliances make for ideal temperature in winter; a mechanical cooling system is calculated to make it the coolest place in town in summer.

Eight sculpters and 800 artists provided the decorations—1,100 tons of plaster and lime and 500,000 feet of wire being among the materials used.

The estimated cost of operation is $50,000 weekly. If every seat was filled at every performance the box office receipts would approximate $185,000 weekly.

Delinquent Ditch Tax Meet Thurs.

In our issue of September 2 we published a detailed item calling your attention to the free discussion of the delinquent ditch tax problem which at the present time confronts the tax payers in the eighteen eastern townships in Marshall county.

The entire county board of county commissioners and the county attorney will be here on Thursday, Sept. 22 at 10 o'clock a. m., to discuss the matter and offer some prospective remedies.

The meeting will be an open one and everybody is invited to attend, as especially the people from the following townships: Esplee, Moylan, Grand Plain, Agdar, Valley, Eckvoll, East Valley, Mud Lake, Veldt, Rollis, Whiteford, Cedar, Linsell, Thief Lake, Moose River, Como, East Park and Huntly.

It is highly important that the people in the above 18 townships attend as these townships were included in the survey which showed the delinquent ditch tax situation which is now threatening the financial standing of the county.

The county board is holding the meeting here for the convenience of the people in the effected territory and hope that each township will send a representative delegation to the big meeting here at Holt on Thursday, Sept. 22.

Corn for Silage

The best stage at which to cut corn for silage and get the most feed value per acre is when the shuck first begins to turn yellow at the end of the ear and while the leaves are still green. The kernels should be dented and glazed.

Corn in the milk stage contains only about one-half the full feeding-value of the mature plant. When it is partly in the milk and partly glazed, or still not in the mature state, corn has 27 percent less feeding value than when at the proper stage of maturity to cut for silage.

4-H Club To Give Program on Achievement Day, September 23

Messrs. Harrison and Pflughoeft to Be the Speakers of the Day

4-H Club workers representing the local club are now engaged in the preparation for their annual fall achievement day program, the date for the event having been set for Friday, afternoon, September 23, according to an announcement made by leaders of the local club.

The exhibits this year will be somewhat larger than usual, as there are more members enrolled than in the past years, and those who have taken part have put forth special efforts to have the exhibits in first class condition.

The local club, which we can say is one of the largest and peppiest in the county, has held a steady line of meetings all summer and, as a result made a very fine showing of their work which was proved by the many prizes that were awarded the club members at the Marshall County Fair.

The Holt Commercial Club will donate first prizes to the club members who have the best dairy and beef calves and second prizes to the owners of the second best. There will also be a prize for showmanship, cooking, sewing, turkeys, sheep and potatoes.

A free lunch will be served to members of the club and the club leaders and judges.

Mr. H. Harrison of Warren in company with Mr. H. A. Pflughoeft of Crookston, will be here to give the main addresses and rank the exhibits.

The program of the day will commence at 1 o'clock sharp at the new village bandstand were the Holt 30-Piece Community Band will play a few selections before marching to the schoolhouse where the main part of program will be held.

After the program at the schoolhouse the club members will parade on main street and the judges will then pick out the winners in the many projects which are sponsored by the local club.

The program at the schoolhouse will consist of short talks by the local and district club leaders; 4-H club members; the Holt Male Quartet and others who are interested in making the 4-H club achivement day a big success.

The local commercial club met on Tuesday afternoon and appointed several committees to take charge of affairs for the day. In behalf of one of these committtees, the police squad, we ask that those that come to town by car that day, to kindly move them off of main street before 1 o'clock so that arrangement can be made for the parade and judging.

The commercial club also decided to give cash prizes this year instead of buying the different articles which, they believe, would give the winners a better opportunity to buy what they themselves may want as a rememberance of the occassion.

The people of Holt and vicinity feel proud of our active youngsters who are members of the local 4-H club. They not only create a friendly feeling between themselves thru the cooperative methods used in building up an organization of this type but, they benefit greatly from the educational features connected with the various projects and, the club work in general.

In behalf of this little organization we ask that every farmer and his family in this community come in on Friday, Sept. 23 and boost for those whom are trying to make things better thru these methods and, show your appreciation of their achievements.

They are going to be the ones upon whom you can place the responsibility of leadership in our community in the future.

Marshall Co. Achievement Day

The Marshall County 4-H club achievement day will be held at Warren on Saturday, September 24, when winning entries in various projects from all the clubs in the county will compete for prizes in the final show event of the season's work.

It is rumored that so many good men have gone crooked. They probably got kinked in that way from peeking around the corner to see if prosperity was not soon coming.

Martin Mattson of Crookston spent Wednesday and Thursday of last week here taking up some fence he had bought from the Great Northern and moved it out on his farm.

In checking our records we found that we made an error in the item about the school faculty last week. We stated that this year would be the third time that Miss Lanman comes back for a school term but, it is the fourth consecutive year.

JAMES H. RAND, Jr.

IT'S good business to buy now, according to James H. Rand, Jr., president and chairman of the board of Remington Rand, Inc., who has instructed his purchasing department to buy immediately $4,500,000 worth of raw materials and supplies for use this year. The order will affect employment in more than 20 different fields of production and was based, Mr. Rand said, on current prices of raw materials, many of which are the lowest in the company's 55 years of business history. In announcing his order to Secretary of Commerce Roy D. Chapin, the executive said, "I hope this will help to show that American business is ready to prove by action instead of word that it has the courage, foresight and faith to help 'turn the tide in the right direction.'"

Favor Repeal of the Primary Election Laws

Spurred by a Hennepin county grand jury report which called attention to "gross irregularities" in conducting party caucuses in the state last spring, a movement was launched in the city of Minneapolis last week for changes in conventions and primary law procedure so as to eliminate abuses. The next legislature will be asked by the Republican and the Democratic leaders to pass a bill setting up official machinery under which party caucuses can be conducted for the selection of delegates to conventions.

Bankers Favor Public Supervision

Present laws adequately enforced contain ample provisions for government supervision. Bankers universally believe in strong, capable banking departments manned by officials with the discretion and courage to enforce these laws and act under them as the common welfare demands. They believe that these public officials should be paid sufficient salaries to command the services of men of character, ability and a resolute spirit of public service. They believe also that the banking departments should be kept free from all political or other special influence in order to be able to act at all times with single-minded independence solely for the benefit of the public interest.

Although banks in the United States operating under state or national charters are thus subject to supervision of public authority, they are strictly private business enterprises. They are owned by their stockholders and administered by officials chosen through the boards of directors which their stockholders elect. No bank is owned or operated by the United States Government, nor, with one small exception in a western state, by any state government. The function of government in banking is to promote and enforce careful banking administration through the system of examination and supervision which I have described. This, however, does not relieve the individual depositor from the necessity of judging and choosing carefully as to his banking relations, just as in his other business or professional relations. He must inquire for himself into the character and type of institution and men he shall do business with, satisfying himself as to their reputation, reliability and capability. These qualities are essential to complete the element of safety and dependability in any human institution.

ETHICS OF BANKING

By MELVIN A. TRAYLOR

Melvin A. Traylor

We must not take unfair advantage of our competitors. It is entirely proper for us by legitimate means to obtain all the business that we can, but in doing so we ought to do nothing that will injure our competitors and that will in any way aid to destroy the confidence which the banks must repose in each other and which the community at large must repose in the banks as a whole if we are going to thrive, and remember always we cannot thrive separately. We shall either all thrive together or all suffer disaster.

• • •

Sentiment in Banking

No sentiment in banking? Will you recall just one day's activity at your desk—what were the problems you considered? Did they apply solely to the cold-blooded conduct of the affairs of your bank, weighing, measuring, analyzing, valuing securities, extending credit, driving the best bargains possible, having in mind only the material return from your day's labor? Certainly such is not the case. I recall many days—happy days, too—in my experience in a very small country bank, in which I am sure not one-tenth of my time was given to the real consideration of the financial returns to my institution.

• • •

Open Markets

I believe in an open market for the actual purchase and sale both of commodities and securities. But so long as the actual rate for credit in this country swings up and down according to the demand for funds for speculative purposes, little influenced by central or other banking policy, then something is wrong somewhere. Moreover, if business is influenced—as is almost universally charged—by the state of public mind; and if the state of public mind is influenced, as in recent years it most certainly has been, to run the scale from extreme optimism to extreme pessimism according to the characters on a ticker tape, then something is wrong with the public mind, or the conduct of the forces back of the tape. Those responsible must provide the answer.

Stark clutched at the railing of the porch to steady himself. He moistened his lips and the Adam's apple in his throat moved up and down spasmodically. "You got a nerve to ask me that, you d—d murderer," he got out at last.

Not for an instant did Wilson release his fear-filled eyes.

"Were you with Gitner between ten o'clock an' eleven the morning yore father was shot?" he repeated steadily.

"I don't remember right now whether I was. Why?"

"Where were you at that time?"

Jasper, sweating blood, appealed to the judge. "Do I have to stand for his insults, Mr. Fletcher?"

"Not unless they have a bearing on this case. You'll have to show the connection, Wils."

The defending attorney smiled. He had got all the effect he wanted, all he could reasonably hope for. "I reckon I'll withdraw the question, Mr. Fletcher. Far as I'm concerned the witness may step down."

Limply Jasper descended. He felt himself the focus of a battery of eyes. As his glance dodged evasively from one to another he knew they raked him with a new-born suspicion skillfully planted in their minds. Beneath the shock of it he quailed.

Ann Gifford was the third witness. Julia stood beside her while she testified. It was impossible for her to tell her story without emotion, especially that part of it which referred to her sister Nora.

Once Julia, her arms around the young woman, interrupted in a low voice. "Does she have to tell this here, Mr. Fletcher?"

The lawyer answered gently. "A life is at stake. I think she had better tell what she knows."

So Ann told the story, from the day when her sister first met Tom McArdle to the morning when she shot at him and left the man for dead. The impression of that story upon the tense crowd packing the square was remarkable. She told the facts in the simplest possible way, but many of those listening were convicted of guilt. The tragedy that had filled the lives of these girls had been made possible because the men and women who lived near had ostracised them. She told how Stone had tried to be her friend and how in the bitterness of her despair she had pushed him from her with the others.

"Did you see Jasper Stark after Tom McArdle was shot?" Wilson asked.

"Yes. He came to the ranch. He had been there several times to see my sister Ethel, but I did not know it till one day I found him with her. He was bullying her to marry him with the threat that if she didn't he would send me to the penitentiary for killing Tom McArdle."

"What did you tell him?"

"Told him I would't buy his silence at the price of my little sister's unhappiness, and if he wanted to tell what he knew he could."

"What did he say?"

"He started toward her in his bullying way. I drew a revolver and drove him off the place."

There was a murmur of approval that passed through the crowd like a breeze.

"Had he offered to keep still about you if yore sister would marry him?"

"Yes."

From Jasper Stark, at the outskirt of the crowd, came a hoarse denial. "Tha's a lie."

Wilson whirled on him instantly. "Then why didn't you tell before? What made you wait two months before you went to the sheriff with what you knew?"

"I hated to get her into trouble," Jasper retorted. "An' this is the thanks I get for it."

"What thanks did you expect—that Miss Gifford would let you marry her sister for you keepin' quiet?"

Jasper growled, "None o' yore d—n business," and retired from the field.

"I don't reckon I've got any more questions to ask you, Miss Gifford," Wilson said after low-voiced consultation with his client. "We're sure much obliged for all the trouble you took to come to town."

There was a little movement of those near the edge of the crowd. Presently it was seen that a girl was being brought forward as quickly as a way could be made for her. The girl was Ethel Gifford.

"I had to come," she told her sister piteously. "I couldn't stay at the ranch after I read your note. So I made Tony bring me."

"I'm going to use her as a witness, now she's here," Wilson said, his eyes shining with the certainty that his most effective argument would be this shy-eyed girl.

The girl was so young and sweet, her innocent manner so engaging and childlike, that before she had given two sentences of her testimony she had won her way into the hearts of the hard rough men who crowded the courthouse yard. It was fortunate for Jasper Stark that he had vanished from the scene. Otherwise he might have been roughly handled.

When the three girls came down the steps to leave, a lane was made for them along which they passed among murmurs of approval.

The only remaining witness was Dave Stone himself. He looked round, quiet-eyed and fearless, waiting for the examination to begin.

The story he told was the same one he had narrated to the sheriff. Haskell questioned him briefly, then waved a hand to young McCann.

Wilson led him again through an account of the shooting.

"Did you fire in self-defense, to save yore own life?" he asked at last.

The Texan hesitated. "I did an' I didn't," he said. "He was reachin' for his gun when I started for mine. It was him or me, one. Lookin' at it that way, I'd call it self-defense. But before that, if I hadn't told him what a low-down onery lobo wolf he was, I reckon there wouldn't of been any gun play. I expect I called for a showdown when I served notice I'd kill him if he troubled the young women at the sheep ranch any more."

"When you fired, was his gun out?"

"Yes, sir. In the clear."

"He reached for his first?"

"That was the way of it. I beat him to the draw."

Wilson passed to another point. "Did you tell Jasper Stark or Carl Gitner that you intended to get Tom McArdle?"

"No."

"Did you say anything like that atall, anything about having quarreled with him?"

"No. I never had a word with him in my life till the time I shot him."

"Good friends, were you?"

"No, sir." The Texan's denial came cold and hard.

"Meanin' what?"

"Meanin' that I knew he was a cur an' suspected what he had done to that li'l girl at the sheep ranch. He knew where he stood with me an' kept his distance."

"Is there any reason why Jas Stark or Carl Gitner might want you outa the way?"

"Yes."

"You know something about them. That it?"

"Yes."

"Something that might get them into trouble?"

"You're right it might."

"Trouble with the law?"

The Texan's answer was the dramatic sensation of the trial. "If I could prove what I suspect it might hang 'em both," he said evenly.

On that high note of suspense Wilson rested his case.

The jury reached its verdict of "Not guilty" in three minutes. A wild yell of approval filled the night. The men who had been clamoring for Dave Stone's blood nearly tore him to pieces trying to shake hands with him. In an hour he had become the most popular man in Mesa.

* * * * * * * *

Jasper found Mesa no comfortable place of residence after the memorable night when he had tried to engineer the lynching of Dave Stone. Men with whom he had been hail-fellow now met him with a hard and stony stare. Enough had been proved against him to wreck any reputation he might have had as a decent citizen, but it was the suspicion of a greater crime—one so evil that few even whispered it to each other—which made him a pariah among his kind.

At the Circle Cross he met the same chilly mistrust. Neither Julia nor Phil dared meet his eyes for fear of what they might read in them. The only one of the riders with whom he would have had a fellow feeling was Gitner, and the big Texan had been given his time and was now hanging around Mesa.

Except for vanity Jasper's hide was pachydermous, but he could not stand the universal condemnation in which he stood.

"Let's p'int for the hills, Carl," he suggested to his crony. "Even the greasers here treat me like I got yellow fever."

"Suits me fine," the other agreed. "We'll stake a claim an' make a bluff at mining."

Both of them took to their retreat in the mountains a venomous hatred of Wilson McCann.

They rode across the bare desert in the deceptive atmosphere which distorts form, color, and distance. A half day of riding brought them only to the upper foothills and showed a group-range rather than a single one.

"Where we headin' for?" asked Jasper in mid-afternoon.

Gitner slid a sidelong look at him. He knew the purpose of their choice of this locale better than his companion did. "Why, up here a ways. Back of that knob over to the left."

Evening brought them, by devious ways, to a well-concealed park back of a small canyon the entrance of which was camouflaged by a false-front rock face protecting from the eye a narrow gateway.

In the wooded park they rode down to a log cabin on the slope. A man in blue overalls answered Gitner's hail. He brought to the door with him a rifle.

"'Lo, Mark!" the Texan greeted him. "Make you acquainted with Jas Stark."

The man in blue overalls nodded with no enthusiasm. Strangers coming to Dunwig's park were not overwelcome. They had to come well recommended as bad citizens. The Starks were not that, in spite of the lawless streak in them.

"Don't worry about Jas," his companion said, hastening to reassure Dunwig. "He's all right." The particular emphasis he gave the words meant that he was all wrong.

"Better fall off an' light," their host suggested.

They cared for their horses and entered the cabin.

Before he slept that night Jasper was committed to a new course of crime. He did not pledge himself to it of his own choice, for he felt it was dangerous. But Gitner knew too much about him. It was too late to draw back now. He had forfeited the option of being his own master.

For almost a year there had been systematic rustling in the hills. The cattlemen had at first been loath to believe it. Even after the evidence was too plain to deny, they had been inclined to think the offender must be some Mexican nester. But of late the number of missing cattle pointed to organized robbery. Someone was running stock across the border and selling it.

IRVIN MYERS

"Even the Greasers Here Treat Me Like I Got Yellow Fever."

It was a mark of Jasper Stark's declension that his reluctance to joining the rustlers was due to no moral scruples. Yet he had been brought up in a country where the crime ranked as a capital one. All the teaching of his youth reinforced this view. A rustler was a slinking coyote of the desert, to be shot down or hanged if caught red-handed. He had hotly argued this more than once. Now he had slid into that company of the furtive-eyed who must ride crooked trails and look upon all honest folk as potential enemies.

"We'll make a stake, settle our scores with Wilson McCann an' maybe Dave Stone, too, then light out for Sonora," Gitner predicted.

With a few drinks under his belt it was easy for Jasper to believe that this would come true. He would get away from this part of the country where he had been forced to get in so bad and he would make a fresh start in another land. He would have enough to buy a hacienda, maybe not a large place but a comfortable one, he would marry a soft-eyed senorita, and the years of his life would unroll as a pleasant vista of happiness. So he deluded himself, as so many of us do, with the hallucination that the joy of living comes from outward circumstances rather than from within.

The method used by the rustlers of Dunwig's park was a simple one. They stole only cattle running in the hills within a day's drive of their holing place. Most of their work was done at night. No brands were altered till they reached the safety of the pasture ground at the end of the hidden canyon. Here the rustled stock was kept until a dark night made it comparatively safe to rush them over Horse Thief pass and down across the border.

To avert suspicion, Gitner and Jasper bought a few mining tools and some dynamite for blasting. Occasionally they rode down to Mesa and spent a day or two there. Both at Pedro's place and at the Gilt Edge they heard stories of the rustling that was depleting the herds of the cattlemen.

"The Cattlemen's association doing anything about it or just shootin' off its mouth?" Jasper asked when the subject was mentioned at Basford's emporium.

Simp Shell answered. "I understand they've put it in the hands of a committee to investigate. Wils McCann is at the head of the committee, an' he's some go-getter, that boy is." Simp's bland smile denied any specific personal meaning to this. "An' yore brother Phil is a member of it, too. The talk is that they mean business."

"Since when has Phil been kowtowin' to Wils McCann?" Jasper demanded angrily. "If my father had been living Phil wouldn't be doing business with the McCanns. That's a cinch."

"You got the wrong angle to this thing, Jas," the fat man told him amiably. "The time for feuds in this part of the country is past. I've not heard that Phil an' Wils have shook hands, but if so they surely have done right. They're both mighty nice boys, an' there's no reason in the world why they shouldn't be friends."

"Except that Wils McCann killed Father," Stark retorted harshly. "You can claim that Father served notice he was aimin' to shoot McCann. I'm not denyin' that. But that don't make it right for Phil to have any dealings with the man who waylaid Father."

"No—if Wils did," Simp said evenly. "I've been hearin' Dave Stone's story. It's right interesting. By his way of it Wils comes pretty near having an alibi."

"Why not?" Jasper asked truculently. "Ain't it up to one killer to stand by another? Didn't the McCanns save him after he killed Tom McArdle? You're certainly easy, Simp."

Jasper turned on his heel insolently and swaggered away.

CHAPTER XII

On a Hot Trail

Peter McCann stood before the open fireplace in his living room frowning at Joe Walters, one of his cowpunchers. He looked like a grim gray judge of the old school finished in brown leather.

"I won't have it, Joe," he said harshly. "While you're workin' for me you'll obey orders. Any time that don't suit you, why, you can ride down the road. I'll not have you pull yore picket pin. I'm boss on this ranch."

Walters looked down resentfully at his dusty hat. He was on the carpet, and his defense had been brushed aside. He felt this was not just, for it was a perfectly good one. But the old man was so bullheaded there was no use talking to him. Yet it had not been very long since Walters had been shot and wounded by some of the Circle Cross outfit and McCann had offered a thousand-dollar reward to find out who had done it. Now Walters was having the riot act read to him because he had knocked down one of the Stark vaqueros. Sure enough times had changed.

"I wasn't lookin' for trouble," he explained again. "Not none. That bird was full of forty rod an' ran on me aplenty. What's a fellow to do?"

"Weren't hogtied, were you? Nothing kept you from walking out of the Gilt Edge when he started, was there?"

"Want me to stick my tail between my laigs an' run away every time some guy gets biggity with me?"

"You got my orders, Joe. If he belongs to the Circle Cross, duck trouble. I'm putting an end to this feud an' that is the only way to do it. I'd take the same medicine myself I ask you to swallow. If it don't suit you, get yore time. That's short an' sweet."

Walters grumbled but surrendered. He knew when he had a good job and he had no intention of giving it up.

Peter McCann wrote a note to Phil Stark and in it asked him to meet him at Garcia's water hole, a half-way point between the ranches. The answer came in a feminine hand. It was signed by Julia. She said that Phil was away on business connected with the Cattlemen's association but she would keep the appointment in his place.

When the cattleman reached the water hole Julia was waiting for him. Peter, looking at her, spoke abruptly. "You're very like yore mother."

"I've been told so." She added, gently. "You knew her well?"

"At one time, yes." He offered no further explanation. His eyes were on the dry stark desert that had a minute before been a vignette snatched from fairyland. Perhaps he was thinking that there had been an hour in his arid life, too, when the glow and color of a dream had irradiated it.

Julia, through clairvoyant eyes, did not see a hard and fierce enemy stamped with the brand of the desert in every line of the lean and leathery face; she saw a youth, a lover and a friend, good man and true, in that dim past when the pages of his future had not been dedicated to an enduring hate that had poisoned many lives.

"About some trouble yesterday at the Gilt Edge," he began, with no preface. "I want you to understand my men have strict orders not to get into any mixup with yore riders. Far as we're concerned this feud is off. You ended it when you saved my boy's life."

"I'm glad. If only it had never started!"

He knew by the droop of her head that she was thinking of her father. "That would have been better," he admitted. Then, bluntly he asked: "Do you think Wils shot yore father?"

"No. Down in the bottom of my heart I never did think so—except just at first. I thought some of his friends did."

"Do you think that still?"

She looked straight at him, but her lips trembled. "I don't know. I don't want to know."

He knew what she meant, that she was afraid to learn the truth.

"Matt had other enemies besides us," he told her gently. "We hadn't a thing to do with it—not a thing. But I blame myself, just the same. He an' I used to be pardners. We played together when we were young colts, Matt an' I did. Always had to hook up with the same outfit. They called us David and Jonathan. Then trouble came between us. Both of us were hot-tempered an' bullheaded. We quarreled. Our business interests conflicted. This d—n desert wouldn't hardly feed all our cattle before we began to irrigate. Bad years we both lost a lot of stock from drought. So we drifted from bad to worse. But I'm clear on this—none of us McCanns had anything to do with the death of yore father. I thank God for that, because it might have been different the way things were shaping."

She believed him, with a heavy heart. For if this was true, it drove her back to a horrible dread that for a week had lain like lead.

He looked into her stricken face and pitied her. It came to him that he might clear himself with her at too great a cost. If Gitner had killed Matthew Stark there could be only one reason, to prevent him from making a will disinheriting Jasper. She did not yet believe it of her brother. She fought against the growing doubt that kept returning. For the certainty of his guilt would poison her life. But she could not trample down the fear that flooded her.

McCann spoke more cheerfully. "I've lived long enough to know that the things we're most afraid of never come to pass. They just ain't true. Anyone might of shot yore father—some vaquero he kicked off the place or a cow thief he had sent to the pen. Matt was like me one way. He made enemies by pushing right through to what he wanted, regardless. I reckon he was kinda intolerant sometimes."

"Yes, he was high-handed," she admitted. "I'm that way, too."

"Likely enough he'd trompled on some cur's feelings an' the fellow laid for him in the bushes. If I was you, Miss Julia, I wouldn't worry about who [illegible] it. This border country is full of mad hombres driftin' about."

"Yes."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Eagle Long Associated With Pomp and Majesty

The Persian monarchs adopted the eagle as a symbol of monarchy, the Assyrians carved it in stone along with their other emblems of power, as did the Egyptians also. Poets of antiquity termed it the king of birds as the lion was dubbed the king of beasts.

From the time when a Tuscan embassy visited Rome, on a message of kindliness and encouragement to a young nation, bearing among other gifts a splendid royal scepter surmounted by a carved ivory eagle, such majestic figures, first of wood, then of metal, were the standards borne by the Roman legions. Napoleon Bonaparte, in boastful emulation of those conquerors of the world, replaced the oriflamme and other battle flags of France with gilded eagles, which, however, disappeared with the Napoleonic dynasty.

Russia, Prussia, Spain, Poland, Sicily, and Sardinia had already made the eagle their national bird, as did later the United States.

Nor can the respect this powerful and rapacious bird evoked from mankind generally be wondered at, when its size, its powers of flight and of attack, its dignity in repose and on the wing, its ferocity and its beautiful parental care of its young are taken into account.

Spelling Not Paramount

Gen. Zachary Taylor, who became President largely because his victory over General Santa Anna at the battle of Buena Vista turned the Mexican war to the triumph of the United States, was not a good speller. He wrote an account of the battle in which he left the a out of reach, and used very long sentences, one of which was eighty-seven type lines. He is accused of grammatical errors also, which are not surprising in a sentence more than 500 words long. But one may excuse that in a general who with 5,400 untrained men whipped 20,000 fresh troops.

Brief Assyrian Greatness

The Assyrians were warlike, ruthless and cruel, and although great organizers, gave little time or thought to interior decoration that did not emphasize the greatness of their kings. Assyrian furniture was heavy and dull. Its decorations consisted largely of scenes which pictured the venegeance inflicted upon the enemies of their kings. A table supported upon the backs of slaves or vanquished foes was the Assyrian's idea of beauty. Scenes depicting frightful punishments and sufferings were not uncommon on articles of household, palace or temple use. But it was a short-lived period and gave nothing to the furniture arts, not even to the Greeks, whose glory heightened over the dying shadows of Assyrian greatness.

Counting a Million

The time it would take to count a million coins would depend upon the person. In the counting room at the Treasury department the silver is usually weighed rather than counted. An estimate has been made, however, that counting at the rate of 1 a second and 8 hours a day, it would take a person about 35 days to count one million coins.

Scraps of Humor

QUITE A SCARE

The doctor looked down at his patient and shook his head doubtfully.

"You say you have the same nightmare every night," he said, "what is it?"

"I dream that I'm married, doctor," said the pale-faced man.

"To whom?" inquired the doctor.

The patient grimaced.

"To my present wife," he replied. "That's what makes it a nightmare!"

Consolation

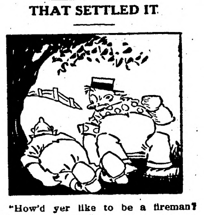
Mrs. Newwedd was paying her mother a visit.

"Oh, mother," she said, as soon as they met, "I'm so wretched. I've discovered that my husband only married me for my money."

Mother raised her eyebrows inquiringly.

"There, there, my dear," she calmly replied, "don't worry about that. You at least have the comfort of knowing that he's not such a fool as he looks."

THAT SETTLED IT



"How'd yer like to be a fireman? They has a snap."

ZUIDERZEE IS NOW CALLED IJESSELMEER

Holland's "Old Man Sea" as a Name Is No More.

Washington.—Dutch engineers have divorced Zuiderzee completely from the North sea by an 18-mile dike. Part of the former salt-water gulf will become a fresh-water lake, to be known as Ijessel lake, or, in the Dutch, Ijesselmeer. Most of it, however, will be pumped dry and developed into neat Dutch farmsteads.

"In separating the Zuiderzee from the ocean the Dutch are no more than reclaiming their own," says a bulletin from the Washington (D. C.) headquarters of the National Geographic society. "Six hundred years ago much of the late Zuiderzee was dry land, protected from the North sea by sand dunes. Then the sea rolled in. Today a huge man-made dike will make possible an increase in the total land area of the Netherlands of 7 per cent, and in the arable land of 10 per cent.

Played Important Part.

"The Zuiderzee basin, with an area of more than 550,000 acres, is almost as large as the state of Rhode Island. Situated in the very heart of northern Holland, it has long played an important part in the commerce and social life of the country. While Holland is rejoicing with her engineers in their greatest victory over their ancient foe, the sea, the fishing villages and quaint islands of the Zuiderzee, beloved of tourists, are silent. Most of the sea ports along the shores of the Zuiderzee are destined to become inland farming villages, connected with salt-water only by canals, while islands may be hillocks, only slightly raised from encircling fields of grain, vegetables and flowers.

"Among the ports which will become rural centers are Edam, famous for its globular cheeses. It once was the water-gate to Amsterdam when the only approach to the greatest of Dutch cities was via the Zuiderzee. Now a deep canal connects Amsterdam directly with the North sea. Artists will miss the water front at Volendam, and the arrival of the little fishing schooners each Saturday morning. Hoorn will live in the annals of the sea, however, in 'Cape Horn,' the southernmost tip of South America, named after the home town of its discoverer, Willem Schouten.

"Perhaps the most lamented change will be that affecting the Isle of Marken, which is destined to become a part of the southeast polder, or drained section. This island, detached from the mainland in the Thirteenth century, lies out of the ordinary routes of travel. Its inhabitants have kept the quaint costumes and queer ceremonies that prevailed when their land became an island. The ground is barely above the water at high tide, but the houses are built on hillocks of earth obtained by digging drainage canals. On seven of these mounds brick and frame dwellings are grouped, while on the eighth is the silent home of the dead.

Need for More Farms.

"Colorful as the ports and islands of the Zuiderzee may be, they have outlived most of their usefulness. Holland's rapidly growing population demands more farm lands. The Zuiderzee, the greater part of which had hardly more than 15 feet of water at low tide, offered a source of new land.

"The land to be reclaimed will be roughly divided into four sections, or polders, by Lake Ijessel, and the mouths of the Amstel and Ijessel rivers. Ijessel lake itself, when drainage operations are completed, will be a long, funnel-shaped body of water running back from the new sea dike to the city of Kampen. It will be a mere shadow of the former Zuiderzee. Most of the new land will be reclaimed from the huge, stomach-shaped southwestern end of the Zuiderzee.

"One polder, the Dutch word applied to any area of land protected by an encircling dike and drained by its own system of pumps, back of Wieringen island, consisting of 50,000 acres, has been completed, and this year crops were harvested from fields which in 1930 were covered with water.

"North Holland has undergone many changes in its water-washed boundaries. The first efforts were precautionary, the war with the waters being wholly on the defensive. The holding of the streams in check, keeping them within their proper channels, allowed some of the marshes to become dry. This gain of land whetted the people's appetite for more. Dutch farmers yearned for thousands of acres too shallow for fisheries but ideal for pasture land to produce cheeses for foreign markets. This led to draining of inland lakes and coastal strips by windmills—the most characteristic feature of Holland landscapes."

Chinese Girls Bring $13 in Flood Area

Harbin, Manchuria.—Daughters of the poor were offered for sale for 50 yen ($13) apiece as floods and guerilla fighting with Manchoukuo and Japanese troops reduced millions of Chinese to desperation.

In Harbin, flood waters of the Sungari river rose in the streets, carrying away the small possessions of destitute families. Mobs gathered, clamoring for aid. Acting at the request of local Chinese, Liuetenant General Hirose, of the Japanese forces, assumed command of the district and declared what amounted to martial law.

Stray Dogs Are Problem on Streets of Istanbul

Istanbul.—Although more than 4,000 stray dogs have been killed by the authorities here in recent months, they still remain a plague in certain quarters. Popular sympathy with the animals handicaps the task of getting rid of them. There have been many instances where sympathizers, especially women, have administered emetics to dogs which had been officially poisoned.

London Has 20,392 Cops

London.—According to official statistics there are 20,392 men in the London police force, of whom 1,396 are engaged in traffic control duties.

Bad Boy in Court

Tonawanda, N. Y.—Charged with threatening harm to his mother, a twelve-year-old boy was haled into court. The woman complained he had a gun. Search disclosed a loaded .32 caliber rifle and a "billy." The youth was reprimanded severely and then dismissed.

FORETOLD PROGRESS OF THOUSAND YEARS

Monk, in 932, Predicted the "Astonishing" Advances.

Paris.—One thousand years ago the monk Theodosius sketched in broad lines what might be expected of the world in 1932. He foresaw a great increase of population, astonishing advances in the sciences, especially in botany, zoology and astrology, and so great an increase in the demand for books that "pious monks will sit night and day copying and recopying the manuscripts of the great bishops of long ago."

Some of Theodosius' guesses went as far afield as others went true, according to Charles Richet, who gives in Le Matin, a translation of pertinent parts of the manuscript, which, he says, he discovered by chance in a Franciscan monastery at Ravenna.

"Will there be a year 1000?" Theodosius asks. "Many good Christians imagine that the year 1000 will see the end of the world and the final cataclysm. But this is probably an error. God is too good to wipe out the human race.

"What shall we find after the year 1000? To seek to know that is not impious. One thing is certain, that well before the 1000 years which I have in mind, the terrible religion invented and propagated by Mahomet will be destroyed together with the hideous book called the Koran, which was dictated by Satan himself. The armies of the infidels, triumphant as they seem today, will have disappeared as dust in the wind. There will be none but God's servants. The Cross will have conquered the Crescent.

Safety on the roads would encourage travel, Theodosius said.

"As to the sciences, they will make astonishing progress. I do not speak of magic, that redoubtable science inspired by the Spirit of Evil to deceive unhappy men, but of botany, zoology and especially astrology. Tiiales saw that amber attracted small bodies when it is rubbed . . . but that is a trick of nature and there is nothing to be hoped for from it. Archytas of Tarentum thought he could build a flying machine, but it is madness to think that man could raise himself into the air like a bird. Icarus gave sad proof of that."

Artist Colony in Iowa Lives in Ice Wagons

Stone City, Iowa.—Gaily decorated ice wagons, painted in the gay grand manner of a gypsy caravan, have revived the crumbling ruins of Stone City, deserted ice cutting camp whose stone towers have been a curiosity here for several years.

Almost 100 Middle Western artists have taken over the camp, installed pallet and brush in the old ruins and are using it as a summer studio. The artists live in deserted ice wagons, redecorated in modern lines. Some of the early arrivals established themselves in a round stone tower which formerly was an ice house.

The artists have hired a business manager who pays living expenses from tourist trade which has flocked here to see the exhibitions and view the artists at work.

Baking Companies Unify Operations

New York.—The National Biscuit Company and the Iten Biscuit Company, will unite their operations throughout the Central West, a joint announcement states. The two companies have been affiliated since 1928, but have continued to operate separately, each maintaining its own complete line of crackers and cookies.

The move will take effect shortly, and Otto H. Barmettler, of Omaha, Neb., President of the Iten Biscuit Company, has been elected Vice-President of the National Biscuit Company to have jurisdiction throughout the territory, with headquarters at Omaha. Mr. Barmettler has been a prominent figure in the baking industry for thirty years, having had previous associations with the American Biscuit Company, the Continental Biscuit Company, and also with the National Biscuit Company.

The Iten Bakeries at Clinton, Ia., Omaha, Oklahoma City and Memphis, and the National Biscuit Company bakeries at Des Moines, Kansas City, St. Louis, St. Joseph, Mo., will continue to be operated on the same scale as heretofore. Iten products will be made and distributed by National Biscuit Company under its name and trade-mark. So far as possible, sales and delivery territories will be rearranged to provide work for the employes of both companies.

This move will co-ordinate the business interest of the National Biscuit Company in Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Arkansas, and Tennessee, and parts of Wyoming, South Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Colorado, New Mexico, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia and Kentucky.

The National Biscuit Company was organized in 1898, and is the largest baking company in the world, employing about 25,000 people, and operating fifty bakeries and 260 branch offices. It makes approximately 500 varieties of crackers and cookies.

City May Pay for Lost Well

Lauriston castle, which attracts thousands of visitors to Edinburgh, Scotland, has lost its mineral well, and the city may have to make good the loss. The waters of the well are credited with unusual healing powers, and it was an attraction in itself. With the construction of a new sewer in the vicinity the well has gone dry. John H. Farley, curator of Lauriston castle, demands that the city lay a pipe to supply water to the fountain and place an appropriate sum to the endowment fund of the castle.

Jackal Carrion Feeder

Jackals are wild dogs of the Old world of several species, particularly Canis aureus of southeastern Europe, southern Asia and northern Africa. They are smaller, usually more yellowish and hunt in packs at night. Jackals feed on carrion and on small animals, including poultry. They frequently devour the carcass of large animals killed by lions and are frequently seen in large numbers in lion country. Jackals can be tamed and by some are believed to be progenitors of domestic dogs.

SPIRITED RED-HEAD VOICES HER PEEVE

All Kinds of Things "Bad" About Hospital.

Well, here I am in the hospital, and I've added a surgical operation to the list of experiences I prefer to forget. Certain of my more obstreperous parts have been removed and put where they no longer can do me a damage. The only thing I suffer from now is prolonged ennui, and that's pretty bad. It takes two medicine men, one hefty interne and a fleet of nurses to keep me in bed. The interne says that they have iron sheets for patients like me, and that if I don't behave he is going to get them out. He says he always has trouble of this sort when a red-headed woman is in the hospital.

I don't want to hurt anybody's feelings, but I don't like hospitals. They're much too dull for my taste. You simply can't sell them on the idea that what you need is a little recreation. They put you to bed at sundown, and wake you up in the cold, gray dawn. They chase your best friends out of your room without a spark of feeling, and give you food that you wouldn't eat for anything. I never want my little boys to find out how I've been treated here. I'd lose my adult prestige.

Besides, you've got to blame somebody for the way you feel those first few days. You register in good faith because you're not hitting on all cylinders. You permit them to wheel you up to the operating room on a banana cart where you wave feebly to the hefty interne. You wonder why they find it necessary to muzzle the interne with a mouthful of gauze when he seems like such a pleasant fellow. I always said that men weren't trustworthy. You go to sleep just as innocent as a baby. Hours later you wake up to find that you've been stabbed in the stomach by at least forty thieves and left high and dry on a burning desert without a drop of water for miles around. You've got to hold that against somebody. If you live to be a million you never get over the astonishment you feel that you actually of your own free will and accord, in full possession of your senses, while you still felt like a million dollars, walked right smack into the arms of an enemy and allowed yourself to be brought to this pass!

My doctor says that it's a good idea for the patient to get a little mad at the physician. It helps work off ire and if the doctor doesn't join in the patient's peeve they'll be good friends in the end. I am a living example of the success of his method. He used to drive me to strong language every time he looked at my chart. He would beam from ear to ear and say, "Fine! Marvelous! God's gift to surgeons!" Inasmuch as I never felt worse in my life, I couldn't see what he was bragging about. Clinically speaking, I may have been perfect, but psychologically speaking, I was ready to kick the bucket. So I got mad at him and felt better.

For five days and five nights not a single Samaritan offered me a mouthful of food, and then somebody deigned to hand me a scrappy little thing masquerading as a custard, but I would have none of it! I screamed bloody murder for Elizabeth, my own personal cook, and told her to send me a custard I could recognize. For days I wouldn't touch a mouthful of hospital food because I couldn't be convinced that it wasn't mixed with anesthetic. Alberta, another cook I know, fell to and made me homemade ice cream every afternoon. If it hadn't been for Elizabeth and Alberta, I'd have starved to death.

Another thing I dislike about the hospital is the bills. On the day I felt the worst, and was least able to appreciate anything that had been done for me, I got a whooping bill of which I could make neither head nor tail. I was furious because of a daily item marked Nu. Bd., $1.25. I thought it meant "new bed," and as I had no new bed and wanted no new bed, I thought I was being gypped, but somebody explained that it was "Nurse's board," and I subsided.

Now that I am better, I can see there is much to be said for this business of just cutting a trouble out. It's much simpler than working hard to overcome it. If you find it isn't pleasant to live with certain of your insides, just give them the air instead of arguing about it. On the whole, my chief complaint is that it's such a bore to lie in bed. Before I came here I was so tired that I thought I'd simply love a few weeks in bed. Everyone that comes in envies me the chance to lie here, and do nothing. Ordinarily, I like to do nothing as well as anybody, but I hate to be told to stay put. If I don't get out of here pretty soon that interne can bring on his iron sheets.—Indianapolis News.

"Clew" of Little Value

The fact that a bandit who robbed a chain grocery store in Lynn, Mass., wore a white cap was of no assistance to police. Thomas McHugh, the store manager, said the man who held him up and forced him to deliver the contents of the cash register wore a white cap. A squad of 25 policemen hunted the city and rounded up 32 men, all wearing white caps. The bandit was not among them.

"Bad" Wolf's Career Ended

"Big Foot," a gray wolf of the Ozark national forest that has been credited with the destruction of more than $5,000 worth of live stock, has been caught at last. Hunter "Uncle Bud" Woodward, of the Arkansas-Oklahoma district, was responsible for the notorious wolf's downfall. "Big Foot" weighed 75 pounds, was 5 feet long and 31 inches high.

Leading the Leader Back

Grover Whalen, former official "Greeter" of New York, was talking to a New York reporter about Russia.

"Russia thinks she is going to lead the world," he said. "Well, Russia in the end will fare like the man in the anecdote.

"'My wife,' the man said, 'told me to lead the old cat off somewhere and lose it. So I put the cat in a basket and tramped out into the country about eight miles.'

"'Well,' said another man, 'did you lose the cat?'

"'Lose it?' said the first man. 'If I hadn't followed it I'd never have found my way back home.'"

Here's a New Game

NO, it isn't Salvo, or Horse Races, or Miniature Roulette. It isn't a new angle on contract or a revised version of tiddly-winks. It's an easy game that you can play on your porch some balmy afternoon over the tea cups when thoughts naturally turn to food. You will no doubt be serving a tomato and fruit juice cocktail or an iced tomato salad of some sort, so give your guests pencil and paper and ask them to write down all of the delicious ways they can think of to serve tomatoes.

Offer a Prize

When the game is ended, everyone will be eager to add to their list the new ways suggested. A prize should be given to the person compiling the longest list. This prize might be a set of cocktail glasses or an attractive small market basket containing each of the kinds of tomatoes packed in cans: solid pack tomatoes, tomato pulp, tomato juice, tomato purée, tomato sauce, tomato paste, tomato soup, okra with tomatoes.

You'll find the lists will contain delicious suggestions, such as stewed tomatoes with toast cubes, stewed tomatoes and mushrooms, scalloped tomatoes, tomato and cheese aspic, frappéd tomatoes, tomato consommé, tomato omelet, Italian spaghetti with tomato sauce, tomato and pea cutlets, Swiss steak with tomatoes, tomato cocktails, tomato salads, tomatoes, in fact, ad infinitum.*

Off-the-Cob

COB and all, in the can, is one of the most delicious ways corn is put up, so you can eat it off the cob, just as if you had gone out and picked it in your own kitchen garden. For that's just what canners do at the right moment.

If you happen to be on the Riviera or over in Naples, we don't know just how you are going to get your garden corn-on-the-cob. That's just the curse of being on the Riviera or over in Naples, instead of out in Missouri or in Illinois or somewhere in the summer-time. The only way out of your dilemma, since serving corn on the cob rightly is an All-American secret, is to take along a few cans of corn-on-the-cob, in which case you'll be the envy of all your American friends abroad.

Eat It All

We can't suggest any recipes for serving them, because you know yourself that steaming hot with butter and salt is the only honest-to-goodness way. But we do suggest that corn on the cob is most fitting with broiled bacon, sautéed scallops and fried chicken. If there is any left over—which there won't be—slice it off the cob and serve it for breakfast in fat, golden-brown corn fritters with slices of pineapple.*

Achievement Day Program at 1 p.m.

Today, Friday Sept. 23, is the day for the annual 4-H Club Achievement Day program, when the results of this year's activities of the Holt 4-H Club will be shown to the people of this community.

The program will begin at 1 p. m. sharp today, at the village bandstand, where the Holt 30-Piece Community Band will play a few selections before marching to the schoolhouse, where the main program will be held.

This will consist of addresses by Messrs. H. Harrison of Warren and H. A. Pflughoeft of Crookston, and short talks by local club leaders and 4-H Club members; vocal and instrumental selections by local talent, and others.

After the program at the schoolhouse the club members will parade on main street and the judges will pick out the winners in the various projects. Prizes will be given by the Holt Commercial Club.

The Farmers' Strike

A farmers' strike on grain and livestock is now on in North Dakota. Picketing the highways will not be done except as a last resort. Potato growers in the northern Red River Valley, meeting at Hoople, N. D., also voted a strike, for a price of at least 40c per hundredweight. Present price is 25c.

The "strike" consists in withholding products from the markets.

Double Grief

A widow had received her fourth letter from an insurance company asking for more evidence to support her claims as the beneficiary of the husband. "I am having so much trouble getting that money," she told a friend, "my poor, dear husband might just about as well not have died at all for all the good his insurance will do me."

Farm Mechanics Instruction

Many of our older farmers will understand the expression "bind a station" with the old style reaper which cut the grain but did not bind it. Later on, came the binder in which the bundles were tied with wire, and wire cutters had to be used before the bundle tied with the wire band could be fed into the separator; the separator was driven by horsepower before the steamer was introduced; two bundle cutters cut the twine bands about the bundles; two men were also needed up on the strawstack keeping the straw away from the straw elevator.

Now we have the gas or steam engine running the separator; no longer does a band cutter have to be stationed on the separator and the straw blower has long since replaced the need for two or three men up in the strawstack.

The tractor and truck and the stationary gas engine to operate the milking machine, cream separators, grindstone or feed grinders and the farm lighting plant are gradually making their way to more and more farms throughout the Northwest.

Each year an increasing number of young men and many older men who have a limited amount of time during the midwinter attend Dunwoody Institute to receive training in some part of what we term the FARM MECHANICS COURSE in which instruction is available on tractors, stationary gas engines, small steam engines and boilers, farm lighting plants, light blacksmithing, farm carpentry and similar equipment.

Dunwoody Institute is a large, privately endowed school conducted without profit for training the residents of the State in industrial and mechanical lines and is very much interested in being of increasing service to all groups including the Farm Mechanics section as discussed in this article.

Dunwoody Institute is located in Minneapolis, Minn., and is literally "your and my Institution."

Bear Victims Recovering

Maurice Day and Lloyd Hilbourne, the two forest rangers who came near being killed in a fight with a bear Tuesday, September 6, twenty-three miles south and four miles east of Roosevelt, are convalescing at the Warroad Hospital.

Both men were considerably torn up by the bear, but Mr. Hilbourne's condition was the worse. It was necessary for the surgeon to sew up 207 holes and he had more than fifty other wounds.

Game Warden Axel Nelson visited the place shortly after the happening and stated that the field of battle was a bloody one.

According to the best information obtainable, the two men were attacked by the bear as they stood watching a bear cub. They were unarmed except for a pocket knife. One of the men was chased up a tree but the bear went after him and pulled him down. The two men were game and stood by each other. The animal was finally beaten off but not before she had clawed Mr. Hilbourne's face wide open and ripped big fleshwounds on his body. Mr. Day was likewise badly ripped by the bear's claws.

As the bear attacked one of the men his companion would go to the rescue. Mr. Hilbourne clinched with the bear, and it was then that the bear put her claws into the patrolman's face and laid it open. The animal got him down and started licking the blood from his face.

Mr. Day broke off a ten-foot club from a tamarack deadfall and went to the rescue. The bear turned its attention to his new assailant and grabbed the stick. The use of the little pocket knife may have caused the bear such injuries that it decided to leave.

Hilbourne suffered much loss of blood and was in a very weak condition when brought to Warroad.

The men were on reconnaissance work in the Red Lake Game Preserve.—Roseau Times-Region.

Railway Wage Cuts

American railroads set the machinery in motion recently to cut the basic wages of their employes 20 percent.

A bitter fight against the reduction is anticipated from organized labor and the nine railwas executives who decided upon the step Friday expect the wage adjustment will go the whole route from conference table to U. S. board of mediation and finally to arbitration.

Nevertheless the railways hope to trim their payrolls next February 1 to a figure 10 per cent lower than the current rates promulgated as a voluntary 10 per cent reduction for 12 months last February.

Corn for Silage

The best stage at which to cut corn for silage and get the most feed value per acre is when the shuck first begins to turn yellow at the end of the ear and while the leaves are still green. The kernels should be dented and glazed.

Corn in the milk stage contains only about one-half the full feeding-value of the mature plant. When it is partly in the milk and partly glazed, or still not in the mature state, corn has 27 percent less feeding value than when at the proper stage of maturity to cut for silage.

Calories for Kids

"MARY-JANE and Junior are having guests for luncheon today."

This is the weekly statement of a wise mother who finds time to give her youngsters an opportunity to play host and hostess. She maintains that having Tommy-from-Next-Door or Joan-from-Around-the-Corner introduces the children to better table etiquette and to a variety of foods that they like because Tommy or Joan like them.

Recipes for Decorative Dishes

Calories and vitamins are skillfully concealed in creamed chicken that deluges a mainland of toast triangles, carrot boats hoisting real sails and bearing cargoes of golden pineapple, and cocoa with a marshmallow island afloat. There's a hidden treasure of real caloric content in these recipes:

Cream Chicken on Toast: Two cups cold cooked chicken cut in dice (if you haven't left-over chicken, the canned product is delicious), two cups white sauce, a pinch of celery salt. Heat chicken dice in sauce and add celery salt.

Carrot Boats with Pineapple: Scoop raw carrots into boat shapes and fill with segments of canned pineapple. A toothpick and plain white card make a marvelous sail.

Party Cocoa: This need not cut into your precious "quart-a-day" bottle if you keep condensed milk on hand. One teaspoon cocoa, one cup boiling water, two tablespoons condensed milk. Mix cocoa and one-half cup boiling water. Boil three minutes. Pour this mixture into the diluted milk and beat with egg-beater. Top with marshmallow.*

He turned to another subject, one that had been on his mind a good deal of late. "It wouldn't be hardly reasonable to expect you to be friendly with us McCanns. Now that Matt has gone it's too late for me to fix things up. But I want to tell you how I feel. When I heard of what had happened to him it gave me a jolt. At first I was worried about Wils. But while I was sittin' there at the Circle Cross by his bedside, after he began to mend some, I couldn't get Matt outa my head. We were mighty close, like I told you, in those early days. I kep' seein' him as he was when we frolicked around together. An' there was you, lookin' the spittin' image of yore mother, first savin' my boy's life an' then lettin' me come to yore house an' stay with him. I'll say you made me feel like a plugged nickel, you an' yore young brother Phil. How could I go on hatin' you Starks after that? I reckon I'm a tough an' stubborn proposition, but I had to give in. No other way to it."

In her eyes swam little wells of tears. "I wish you had come to Dad while he was alive and asked him to make up. Why didn't you?"

"Because I'm a hardened old sinner h—l-bent on gettin' my own way. I couldn't any more have come to Matt than he could of come to me. But with you it's different. First off, I can't ever pay what I owe you, not if I live to be a hundred an' lie awake nights figurin' out ways. Then, too, whenever I look at you, I see yore mother shinin' outa yore eyes."

"You—loved her?" she asked, very softly.

Again he looked across the arid desert at the papiermache mountains. In the peculiar afternoon sunlight they looked like artificial stage settings.

"Yes." He spoke, it seemed, rather to himself than to her.

"Was it about her you and Dad quarreled?"

"No. About some trifling thing to start with. We had kind friends to keep us stirred up. When he was for a thing, I fought it. If I wanted it he was against it. The older we got the worse it grew. But I'm through now. I throw up my hands. I quit. If there can't be friendship between us, anyhow there will be peace."

"Yes," Julia agreed.

"We'll let it go at that."

"It's not that I hate you—any of you—any more. I see now there's nothing but loss in that. But I don't see how we can be friends. Dad stands between us and you. If he was alive I could go to him and tell him how I feel. But I can't do that now. I can't feel it would be loyal for us to be friends with his enemies." Her honest eyes appealed to him for understanding.

He nodded. "I reckoned you would feel thataway. Well, I'm glad we've cleared things up. The feud's off anyhow."

"Yes, it's off," she assented.

Peter did not offer to shake hands on it. He glanced at the descending sun. "I'll be hittin' the home trail," he said.

She turned, after she had ridden a little way, to watch him, a strong, straight-backed figure sitting his horse like a Centaur. A lump choked her throat. The sight of him carried her mind back irresistibly to her father. He, too, had been virile and purposeful and dominant, but beneath the gnarled surface she had known him tender and loving. What a waste that his last years should have been embittered by this implacable quarrel with the man who had been his closest friend! What a loss that he should have been cut off in his prime! Surely if he had lived the breach would have been healed.

Phil was combing burrs out of his pony's mane when the cowpuncher, Red, rode into the yard at the Circle Cross and fell into the easy posture of the rider who intends to be comfortable while he stops and chats.

"How'll you swap that paint hoss for my buckskin?" Red drawled after greetings had been exchanged.

"I ain't swapping this peg pony for any other in Arizona," Phil announced proudly.

"You sure got some notion of yore broomtail, boy. I was allowin' you'd orta gimme about ten dollars to boot. Buck's no plug, I'd have you know. Mighty few broncs can travel alongside of him. Seventy miles he done yesterday in the hills an' never turned a hair."

"Where was it you an' Buck broke the world's record?"

"Up in the Mal Pais—taking a New York engineer over the divide to look at Basford's copper proposition."

"Didn't meet up with any rustlers whilst you were up there, did you?"

About to give a careless negative, Red stopped with his mouth open. "Why, dawggone my hide, maybe I did," he said at last. "I never thought of it till right now. We was 'way up above Guadaloup canyon when we saw a coupla men driving eight or ten vacas into it. I hollered, but they was a long way off an' didn't answer. Maybe at that I'm lucky they didn't hear me."

"Headed south, were they?"

"Y'betcha! They went into this end of the gulch an' that's the last we seen of 'em."

Phil spoke his thoughts, to himself rather than to Red. "Funny they were 'way up there. Who could they have been? Where were they goin'? Unless they were rustlers. Wish you'd ride to the Flying VY an' tell Wils McCann what you've told me. It won't take you more than three-four miles outa yore way, an' Buck being the best traveler in the U. S. A.—"

"Which I'm bettin' my boots he is."

"It'll hardly be any trouble a-tall. Tell Wils I'll meet him at Jim Yerby's along about three o'clock."

The cowpuncher was still in sight when Julia came out to the porch.

"I'll have to leave, sis," her brother said.

"Red tell you something?" she asked.

He repeated to her what the range rider had said.

She nodded agreement. "Looks like you've struck a hot trail. What do you mean to do?"

"I'm going to put it up to McCann. My notion is for him an' me to drift up to Guadaloup and see what we see."

"Let me go, too."

"Now looky here, Jule, you be reasonable," he protested. "This is no woman's job. You know that mighty well. We're out after bear meat. We're liable to be out three-four days. I never did see such a girl for wantin' to boss everything."

"I don't, either. I'm not trying to boss this. Far as that goes I've been up in the Mal Pais before. You remember when we went hunting with Dad and stayed a week."

"Well, you're not going."

"I don't want to go. I'll ride with you far as the sheep ranch. I can stop there tonight with the girls. I'll tell Ethel what a nice boy you are and how kind to your sister."

"I can tell her anything it's necessary for her to know," he said, flushing beneath the tan.

"You might omit something on account of being so modest."

He looked at her suspiciously, remembering something Jasper had once told him. "I reckon you're not going to meet Wils McCann, are you?"

His words struck out of her face the laughter, the gleam of sisterly malice that had sparkled in her eyes. "What do you mean?" she asked tensely.

He was ashamed of himself, sorry he had spoken. "I didn't mean that, Jule."

"Of all the mean things you could have said—" She stopped, from sheer inadequacy, then turned and walked swiftly into the house.

Phil stood a moment, frowning at the ground, then slowly followed. He had not meant really to hurt her and he could not let it stand so. He knocked on her bedroom door, was told sharply to go away, and after a moment entered.

"Sorry, sis. I didn't go to say it. I reckon I was kinda peeved because you were joshin' me."

"If you think just because I was civil to him at Mesa, after he had worked his head off to save Dave Stone—"

"Shucks, I don't think a thing. Nothin' to it. I just shot off my mouth. Don't be sore about it. I'll slap saddles on the broncs an' we'll start."

"I'm not going."

It took him ten minutes of coaxing to get her to relent.

Harmony restored, Phil roped and saddled the horses.

Crossing Tincup pass, they descended to the mesa above the Painted desert. The horses' hoofs flung up clouds of fine dust in the fringe of desolation which lay between the mesa and the sheep camp.

"I was sure enough spittin' cotton," Phil told Ethel after he had drunk two glasses of the lemonade she made for them. "Down in the basin she's certainly dry as a cork laig this time of year."

Wilson McCann had not yet passed, Ann Gifford told them, so they sat on the porch and waited for him.

Ann's attitude toward her neighbors was much changed. Her experience with them had broken the ice barrier that had dammed in her the flow of human fellowship. The manner with which she greeted the world was less hostile. Many of the kindly people who lived on the edge of the Painted desert had come to her with warm eyes, a little awkwardly but manifestly in a friendly spirit, and had contrived to suggest that bygones be bygones.

Through Ann's new-born faith in her fellows ran a thread of distress. She knew that the testimony of Ethel and of herself had done much to save Dave Stone. A little flare of fierce and primitive joy rose in her when she thought of it. All her life she would be glad that she had done what she had. She had been forced to risk her reputation or let him die, and she had chosen the better part. The sting of shame in it was that she did not know what the Texan himself thought of it. He had come to her that night and thanked her formally. Since then she had not seen him. Beneath his cold and grave exterior, what was his real feeling about it? She tortured herself with doubts.

It was well past four when Wilson McCann rode across the mesa leading a pack horse. He had not been at home, he explained, when Phil's messenger arrived. Hence the delay.

Julia said a word to him before he left. They were for the moment standing alone. "You'll look after Phil, won't you? He's only a boy."

"I'll do that li'l thing if I can," he answered, smiling into her eyes by way of reassurance.

"Is it safe to go up there—you two alone?" she asked. "I wish you'd wait and take a posse."

He shook his head. "Can't do that. We'd be followin' a cold trail if we did. But I reckon it'll be all right. We're not allowin' to bring any rustlers back with us. Just now we're after information."

"Well, don't let Phil do anything foolish, please."

Again he promised to look after the boy.

He tightened a cinch before he made reference to another subject on his mind. "Father was tellin' me about his talk with you."

"Yes, we smoked a pipe of peace," she said.

"I'm sure glad. Far as I was concerned it wasn't necessary. I was through, anyhow. You an' yore brother have done too much for me. I'd never lift a hand against you. But it's better to have an open treaty."

"If Dad had only lived," she murmured, more to herself than to him.

"Father can't get over that. I reckon they hated each other, but there was something between them deeper than hate. I expect Mr. Stark knows that now, if over there they know about things here. Likely their hate hurt them a lot more than they let on."

"That's what I think. Did your father tell you about how I feel?"

Her deep eyes met his and through him went a thrill that quickened his pulses. His drumming heart beat the tidings that he wanted this lovely girl, so quick and vibrant with life, so passionately desirous of the fine things it had to offer—wanted to take her for his mate and spend the years of his life beside her. Yet he knew it could not be. There was a chasm between him and her that could not be bridged.

"Yes. I understand that too. It's the only way you could feel. But. . . . Remember that night we rode across the desert together an' talked about how it had got us, how it had made us tough an' ferocious an' harsh like that clump of cactus there; an' how you said it had another side, too, for from that dry waste came lovely flowers an' outa the heat came hours when the air was all rose-colored an' pink an' lilac? I've thought a heap about that, an' you sayin' it was thataway with our lives, too. It's so. . . . What I'm gettin' at is this, that if the desert makes us gaunt and hardy, if it gives us endurance and fierceness, shows us how to survive when softer folks, untrained by it, would crumple up an' die, maybe these very qualities, brought into service an' subdued to use, are the ones we've got to have to win out on this thirsty frontier. We live where we're always seein' the flash of teeth. We've got to stand heat an' drought an' hardship or get off the map. All summer my sister has been tryin' to cut the ironweed outa her garden, but it's still there, I notice."

"Yes, it's tough, like the bisnaga and the cholla and the prickly pear," she agreed.

"Nature gives hooks an' barbs an' saw-edged teeth to those of her children that need 'em. A mule-deer learns to go a coupla weeks without water. Same way with prairie dogs an' coyotes. If they couldn't stand thirst they wouldn't last long. No different with us. We've got to meet the conditions. But there's something born in us that stays with us. Even when we get tough as leather we're all right inside, maybe. On the dry desert things take a long time to rot. I've seen mighty tough citizens who had clean hearts when once you got to them." He laughed at himself. "I'm not gettin' anywhere, but you know what I mean."

"Yes, I do," she told him. "And it's true. They call Mr. Stone a killer, but I'd trust him anywhere. But I wouldn't trust that Gitner."

"You'll Look After Phil, Won't You? He's Only a Boy."

"No, you're right about Gitner. He belongs to the lobo family, I reckon. Well, I'll be movin' along."

"I don't think you belong to the lobo family, Mr. McCann," she told him impulsively. "I did once, but I've changed my mind."

Their level gazes met.

"Much obliged for that," he replied in the drawl of the Southland. "I don't reckon I'd better tell you what I think about you."

Into her dark eyes there flashed a momentary panic. She drew back, her pulses fluttering.

Phil called across to his companion. "Ready, Wils?"

The two horsemen disappeared round a bend in the road.

Wilson McCann and Phil Stark did not find Yerby at home. A Mexican boy herding sheep on the hillside near said he had seen him start townward in the morning.

The trail ascended steeply. The travelers left behind them the desert vegetation. The lean and haggard ocotillo, cruel of claw, no longer shared with the mesquite dominance of the landscape. Catclaw and cholla were still to be seen and occasionally a Spanish bayonet. Scrub oaks and juniper appeared, at first straggling and hesitant. The riders passed through a splendid grove of live oaks festooned with great clumps of mistletoe, and as they still climbed upward pines were silhouetted against the skyline.

They camped far up in the hills, choosing for the location a small park where grass grew in place of burroweed. The very sky had changed its character. It had become more live, much nearer, a deeper blue. The tang of the pines was in the winey air.

Phil chopped fuel and built a fire while his companion undid the lash rope and removed the cross buck from the pack horse, picketed the animals, and brought water from the spring. After supper they smoked a pipe and chatted.

"We'd ought to reach Guadaloup by nine o'clock, wouldn't you say?" Phil murmured sleepily, his head pillowed on the most comfortable spot of his saddle.

"I reckon. If we get an early start."

They were up before daybreak. The sun was just peeping over the ridge when McCann threw the diamond hitch with the lash rope. It was possible, though not probable, that at any time they might jump up the rustlers driving stolen cattle. Wherefore they rode warily, following ridges where they could so that they could sweep with their eyes as much territory as was feasible.

Guadaloup canyon opened before them after an hour or two of travel. Precipitous walls shut them into a defile, narrow and tortuous, up which they moved in single file. The soil was a red clay formation. Loose rocks strewed the floorway of the gorge, flung down ages ago from the heights above.

The trailers dismounted and studied the ground. Sure enough there had been cattle here and recently. Prints of horses' hoofs showed that they had been driven and had not strayed here by chance. This they already knew, by the testimony of the cowpuncher Red.

They followed the gulch for several miles. The walls opened out, so that the sun beat down upon the riders and baked them. There was no shade. The only vegetation showing was the creosote clinging to the rocks. Even this was scarce and stunted.

A bend in the canyon brought them to a clump of small pines. A spring emerged from a fissure in the red stone strata.

Wilson stopped the other rider. "Hold on! Let's have a look before we mess up any tracks that may be here."

They swung down and grounded the reins of the horses. Through the red sand ran half a dozen tracks of sidewinders.

The men moved forward slowly to the damp soil surrounding the spring. What Wilson was looking for he found. His finger pointed out a heel mark. The boot was evidently much run over on the outside and the heel badly worn. The print of the same foot was stamped also in another moist spot below the spring. It had been made by a very large boot.

"Some folks are right careless," McCann said.

"Sure are. Fellow who stomped that track is a considerable sized guy. He had ought to be careful where he writes his signature."

"If he knows what's good for him he'll write it in Mexico muy pronto."

"Looks like he's near the end of his trail here. Now we're on to him he'll not last long, I'd say. They must be holin' up near here."

"Not so far away." Wilson spoke apparently without stress. "Gitner knows these mountains pretty well, I expect."

"You think it's Gitner." Phil was startled, though the words voiced a fear that had been in his own mind.

"Looks thataway. You know Gitner's big feet, an' how his boots are always run over at the heel."

The boy made no answer. A disturbing thought had found lodgment in his mind, one so full of ill omen that the muscles beneath his heart seemed to have given way. If Gitner was one of the rustlers—and he no longer doubted it for a moment, scant as was the evidence at hand—was Jasper also one of them? The thought of it shook his courage. There was nothing admirable in his brother, nothing that as a boy he could look up to as an example. But it was a long step from worthlessness to cattle thieving. Almost the worst crime on the docket in the border land is rustling. It gave him a shock to face the possibility that his father's son might be guilty of it.

"Afraid I Won't Keep My End Up; So You Want Me to Turn in My String of Horses?"

It was precisely because of this that Wilson had mentioned Gitner's name. If the boy had to meet such a facer it was better that he should have time to reflect upon it first.

"This isn't yore job, Phil," the older man said presently. "You ride home an' tell Jim Yerby an' Dave Stone to meet me at the mouth of the canyon in two days. I'll stick around an' do some scoutin' till they come."

Phil looked him straight in the eye. "It's my job much as it is yours. If you thought it was my job yesterday, what makes you say today it's not? Nothing has changed, far as I can see."

They were both thinking of the same thing, that one of the men whose trail they were following might be Jasper Stark. But Wilson could not refer to his fears any more than the boy could, except indirectly when they mentioned the name of the big Texan.

He evaded. "This is liable to be a bigger task than I had figured. If we meet up with Gitner he'll go to shootin' sure. I reckon we need more help."

"All right," agreed Phil calmly. "You go get it an' I'll scout around an' wait for you."

McCann's brown white-toothed smile flashed. He was not getting very far with the boy. "Feelin' real cock-a-doodle-do, ain't you? I'm not claimin' to be high, low, jack, and the game, but I'm some older than you. Seems to me it's my say-so."

"Afraid I won't keep my end up, so you want me to turn in my string of horses?" Phil asked, using the figure of speech of the puncher on the trail.

"No, sir, not a bit afraid of that. I've a notion you'd go through from h—l to breakfast. But like I said, this Gitner's a lead pumper. He'll have four-five fellows with him, all of 'em tough nuts to crack. My notion is for you to go back an' pick up some of the boys—say Curt Quinn an' Stone an' Yerby an' my brother Lyn. You'll be back in two days if you're so h—l-bent on bein' in this and we'll sure round up these birds an' tell 'em what for."

"That wasn't yore notion when we started. This was to be a scoutin' party to cut the trail of these rustlers an' report what we found out."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Airplane Control That Takes Burden of Flight

The Sperry airplane pilot is an invention which makes flying safer. It is a gyroscopic control which makes instant corrections for all effects of air currents and shifting of weights upon an airplane, and keeps the craft flying in a perfectly level position on a true course. It is a control that has been used by the military services in bombing planes and is designed on mechanical principles identical with the automatic steamship pilot which has been in use for many years. Many merchant and naval vessels are equipped with the device.

The airplane pilot does not eliminate any of the crew, but takes the strain of long flights from them. The crew makes all take-offs and landings in the usual way, turning the plane over to the automatic pilot to be kept level and on a straight course after the craft is in the air. It can fly through darkness or fog as easily as through clear weather, and is essential to uninterrupted air transport services and long flights, allowing the pilot to concentrate on navigation.

ON SEPTEMBER 11, the eighteenth anniversary of the Battle of the Marne, a fine memorial of that mighty struggle was presented to the French nation by America, whose citizens to the number 4,000,000 contributed its cost. The piece of statuary, entitled "France Defiant," rises 130 feet above a 60-foot pedestal, on an eminence overlooking the battlefield. It stands as high as a seven-story building, and is the largest monument in France. It was designed by Frederic MacMonnies and Edmondo Quattrocchi was the sculptor. The motif of the memorial is a woman symbolic of France at bay, supporting a stricken soldier son. An infant emblematic of the future clings to the hem of the woman's tattered robe. On the front of the pedestal is Marshal Joffre's famous message to the French army on the eve of the battle:

"At this moment when a battle impends upon which rests the fate of our country no one must look behind. All must unite to attack. Any troop finding itself unable to advance further must hold the ground and fight until death. No retreat!"

JOSEPH V. McKEE, who became mayor of New York on the resignation of Jimmy Walker, was informed by the citizens' budget commission that the city pays more than $1,000,000 every day in the year for salaries for its employees. Therefore he got busy at once on economies in a way that made the politicians gasp. First he announced that his own salary was reduced immediately from $40,000 to $25,000 a year. Then he served notice that, after October 1, no city commissioner appointed by the mayor would receive more than $12,000 a year. And more of the same sort was expected to follow.

The budget commission pointed out that in the six years of the Walker administration 32,380 extra positions had been added to the city pay roll at a total cost of $120,633,223 a year—practically a third of the year's entire payment for personal service.

SCANDAL concerning labor employed on government jobs has been transferred from western projects to the lower Mississippi river valley. Charges have been made that workers in river flood control construction camps down there are held by contractors in a virtual state of peonage; that the men are working 12 hours a day and 7 days a week at very small wages. Since this falls in the province of the Department of War, Secretary Patrick J. Hurley took cognizance of the charges and sent Gen. Lytle Brown, chief of army engineers, to make an investigation.

LOS ANGELES, the prolific source of tragedies, provided another—the suicide of Paul Bern, moving picture executive and husband of Jean Harlow, a famous screen actress. For reasons that at this writing are unknown, Mr. Bern shot and killed himself in the beautiful home he presented to his bride when they were married two months ago. He left a note that only added to the mystery. It said he was making good "the frightful wrong I have done you" and wiping out his "abject humiliation," and Miss Harlow insisted she did not know what he meant and that they had been perfectly happy together. Mr. Bern, who was born in Germany 42 years ago, had been actor, stage manager and director, and in his work in pictures was very successful and popular. His associates said he had been acting strangely of late, and that his mother and three of his sisters had committed suicide.

One possible explanation for Bern's suicide was revealed when it was learned that for years before his marriage to Jean Harlow he lived with another woman. His brother asserted Bern continued to support her in a sanitarium after she had a nervous breakdown, and that Miss Harlow knew all about it. For ten years this woman lived at the Hotel Algonquin in New York city as Mrs. Paul Bern and paid her bills with checks sent to her fortnightly from Hollywood by the movie executive. She left the hotel last winter and had her trunks shipped to San Francisco.

RAPID progress on the government's $700,000,000 public building program was reported by the Treasury department in a review of authorized projects.

The report said that specific authorizations aggregated $496,463,942 and that 230 buildings costing $71,400,219 had already been completed. It further reported 382 projects with a total cost limit of $324,588,323 were under contract either in whole or in part.

In regard to 136 projects costing $42,172,900, the treasury said they either were in the specification stage or that bids had been received for their construction.

It was explained that Secretary Mills had not yet determined on the expenditure of the $100,000,000 provided in the relief act for public buildings.

MOST widely known of those who died during the week was Sir Gilbert Parker, Canadian novelist, traveler, lecturer and politician, who passed away in London at the age of sixty-nine years. He first gained fame as the author of "The Right of Way" and other novels.

Scholars Hail Recent Discoveries at Samaria

Beautiful Ivory panels, dating from the year 800 B. C., and depicting lotus buds and flowers, strange animals and celestial beings from the Egyptian pantheon, have been discovered at Samaria, the ancient capital of the kingdom of Israel. The site of this discovery leaves no doubt that these ivories belonged to the "house of ivory" mentioned in the Bible—I. Kings 22:39—for the inscription carved on one of them bears the name of Hazel, king of Damascus, 850-800 B. C. One panel shows a fight between a bull and a lion in relief. Others show cherubs and sphinxes. A third represents the personification of eternity. These discoveries, which are due to the joint work of British and American archeologists, are of the greatest importance in illustrating the civilization of the period.

News of Minnesota

EVENTS of the week throughout the "State of Ten Thousand Lakes" told in brief form

Wyoming—Five deer put in an appearance near here, less than 35 miles from the Twin Cities.

Jeffers—The village council here is considering granting a franchise to a natural gas company for the establishment of a gas plant in Jeffers.

Madison—The Lutheran Normal School, which has been operated here for more than 40 years, will not open for the fall and winter term this year.

Mora—Thirty-five cans of young trout were delivered by the state to the local Izaak Walton League chapter to be planted in streams of this territory.

Pipestone—The new $71,000 hospital building at the Pipestone Indian school was opened. The new structure will serve the Minnesota-South Dakota district.

Wayzata—A twin-motored Sirkorsky seaplane is being groomed here for a proposed flight from Lake Minnetonka to Oslo, Norway, sometime this month.

St. Paul—Dorothy Eiler, 16, of Hill City and Earle Teeter of Granada, 4-H club members, were chosen as health champions of Minnesota at the State Fair.

Faribault—Work has started on wrecking the old Rice county courthouse, which was partially destroyed by fire, in preparation for the erection of a new structure

Kenyon—Kenyon's diamond jubilee celebration will take place Friday, September 16. A special feature will be the dedication of the new municipal electric light and power plant.

St. Paul—Wild beaver are more plentiful and more widely distributed in Minnesota now than at any time in the last 40 years, according to W. T. Cox, state conservation commissioner.

Stillwater—More than 1,000 farmers of Washington county are on record as demanding a price of $2 per hundredweight for milk, instead of the prevailing price of a little more than $1.

So. St. Paul—Railroads placed into effect reduced rates on livestock shipped to South St. Paul from a radius of 160 miles of the market. Reductions ranged from 25 to 43½ per cent in freight rates.

St. Paul—A state law which will make possible the borrowing from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by closed state banks on their deposits will be asked by J. N. Peyton, state commissioner of banks.

So. St. Paul—Two carloads of choice steers set a new top price for more than a year on the South St. Paul livestock market when they sold for $9.50 a hundred weight. The steers were sold by Robert J. Nelson of Tracy.

Winona—Construction of a new $25,000 hull for the government dredge Cahaba has started here on the river beach. A crew of about 40 men will be employed for about two months. The hull will be 46 by 130 feet and 7 feet deep. It will be constructed of Washington fir.

Willmar—Col. Cushman A. Rice, 54, Minnesota's most famous soldier of fortune, immortalized as the original of Richard Harding Davis' "Captain Macklin," died at his summer home at Green Lake, near Willmar, his birthplace. Business places closed for the funeral.

St. Paul—The state executive council, without fixing a maximum limit, granted emergency relief to five northern Minnesota counties in which farmers suffered severe losses from recent hail storms. The counties are Mahnomen, Norman, Carleton, Aitkin and St. Louis. They asked for a total of $73,000.

St. Paul—W. T. Cox, state conservation commissioner, announces that the previously set total of 30 will cover upland game birds, ruffed grouse, quail and pheasants. Three pheasants may be taken in one day, with a limit in possession at one time of six, the season total for pheasants being 18.

Prosper—Highway authorities of Minnesota and Iowa will accept, on behalf of their respective states, a granite marker placed by the U. S. Highway No. 55 association on that highway, a mile south of here, at a ceremony to be held Sunday, Sept. 25, in commemoration of the completion of paving of U. S. highway No. 55.

Minneapolis—Lieutenant-Commander G. Marvell of the local recruiting station reports the following young men from this state have enlisted in the U. S. Navy and are now at the Great Lakes in recruit training: G. K. Gilbertson, Benson; Daniel W. Larson, Amboy; J. R. Halvorson, Proctor; W. O. Ward, Mankato; K. R. Rietman, Becker; L. P. Barrett, Faribault; L. B. McMahon, Tracy; R. H. Hesketh, Misswa; D. L. Sauvagaw, Brainerd and R. H. Gilbertson, Pine River.

Life's Proudest Moment

"No bigger than a minute"—when he arrived . .

But look at him now! See what the scales are saying! Look at those muscles! Look at that husky framework! Look at the bright-eyed, pink-skinned health of him!

It comes over you both with a great surge of happiness—he's a perfect specimen, your baby!

• • •

Can a baby thrive like that, if his mother's milk fails?

Millions of mothers nod a beaming "Yes!" For millions of mothers in America have had proof in their own homes that Eagle Brand builds wonderfully sturdy babies—babies that grow to be men and women of fine physique, outstanding health.

And recently, two famous baby specialists put Eagle Brand to one of the most searching tests that modern science has ever given a baby food. They fed fifty average infants on Eagle Brand* for a period of months, comparing results with other groups of babies similarly fed on other foods. They tested these babies' progress with the X-ray, with blood counts, with measuring, weighing, every modern check on growing structure, growing strength.

And measured by every scientific test, the result was favorable to Eagle Brand. These Eagle Brand babies showed themselves superbly nourished—lacking in nothing that makes for future health and stamina. Eagle Brand* had proved itself equal in every way to the building of 100% babies!

You see, Eagle Brand is wonderfully easy to digest—second only to mother's milk in easy digestibility. Every drop goes quickly into the making of bones and teeth, tissue and muscle, energy and strength. Eagle Brand is easily prepared—you merely add boiled water. See directions on the label. Eagle Brand is free from dangerous germs—safe for your baby. It keeps indefinitely in the can. And can be obtained at any grocer's.

Send for a free copy of "Baby's Welfare"—an 80-page booklet on feeding and caring for baby. It gives you pictures and histories of a number of Eagle Brand babies. And let us send your physician a report of the scientific test we have described.

As with mother's milk, or any milk diet, the usual supplementary foods were given. These are, of course, orange or tomato juice, and cod-liver oil or other source of the antirachitic Vitamin D.*

PRODUCTION OF FINE COFFEES NATIONAL PRIDE OF COLOMBIA

Weeding Plantation (above); Transplanting Coffee Shrub (right).

Photos—Nat. Fed. of Coffee Growers of Colombia.

CHICAGO.—Fine coffee growing is to the Republic of Colombia what thoroughbred horse raising is to England—a national pride.

There are now more than 400,000,000 coffee trees, which bear close to a half billion pounds of the product annually, in that republic, which is the largest producer of the world's finest grades, known as "milds."

The seeds for new growths are selected with scrupulous care and the most modern cultivation methods are used by the coffee planters in Colombia. Coffee experimental farms have been established throughout the republic by the National Federation of Coffee Growers to benefit the planters in solving cultivation problems.

The coffee is first planted in a seed bed, later transplanted in a nursery, and finally when about 1½ feet high the growths are placed in prepared groves at a distance of 6 to 10 feet apart. Colombian coffee groves are located in altitudes ranging between 2,500 and 6,500 feet above sea level. Permanent shading of the groves—a highly important factor—is provided by the use of "guamo" and acacia trees, which absorb very little moisture from the soil and permit the penetration of sufficient sunlight so essential to coffee growths.

The coffee trees, which grow to a height of 14 to 20 feet, are kept pruned to 6 to 8 feet. They begin to bear when five years old. In Colombia, only the ripest (deep red) cherries of the coffee trees are harvested. The cherries are hand-picked, not stripped, from the branches. They are then cleaned and prepared for market by washing.

Practically all the better blends and brands of coffee depend upon their Colombian content for flavor and aroma. The United States imports approximately 350,000,000 pounds of Colombian coffee annually.

INDUSTRY SEES HOPEFUL SIGNS, BANKERS TOLD

Leading Automobile Unit Expects to Employ More Men This Winter Than Last

MOTOR SUPPLY IN HANDS OF PUBLIC FALLING OFF

Twelve Million Years Less Transportation in Nation's Car Inventory Than Considered Normal, Manufacturer Tells Financiers

ESTIMATING that transportation in the form of automobiles now in the hands of the American public is twelve million "car-years" below normal, and that this deficit will eventually have to be made up. Richard H. Grant, vice president of the General Motors Corporation, recently told the American Bankers Association convention that employment in his company may be greater this winter than last year.

"Employment during the winter months is a very important thing," Mr. Grant said. "So far as our corporation is concerned, in November, December, January and February we will be employing at least as many and probably more men than we did this past year."

In order to gauge the outlook for next year's market his corporation, he said, attempts to set up sales indices based on intensive scientific studies in addition to observation and common sense.

"We are in the habit of looking upon an automobile not merely as an automobile but as transporation," he said. "We figure each automobile produced as six years of transportation. Then by following up records of production yearly, we get a graph which indicates what ought to be a normal inventory of transportation in the hands of the American people, and whether there are more or less miles than might be expected. According to our figures, there are about twelve million years less transportation in this inventory at the present time than has been considered normal since 1925.

The Outlook for Business

"Consequently, if we retain the same purchasing power in this country, it is quite evident that on the first upturn of business there will be a rush to replace that inventory. In developing this graph, it has come out very strongly that every third year is a big automobile year. The biggest automobile year was 1929 when 4,100,000 cars were produced for American consumption. This year the industry will produce somewhere between 1,800,000 and 1,900,000 cars. As 1932 is three years after 1929, if economic conditions were normal we could be sure we would do a tremendous business, because the third year is the time when the bulk of the replacing takes place."

He added that there are factors at work that make it uncertain how big the year will be, instancing that "money is being hoarded from lack of confidence and this takes away some purchasing power that we would otherwise have, while family budgets are being cut on account of changes in income conditions, which again means that purchasing power for the automobile, like a good many other things, will be knocked down." As a result, he said, it was necessary to measure what statistically would be a big year against a practical consideration of the curtailment of expenditures which is going on and determine how big the year will be under these circumstances.

"From a long haul standpoint, regardless of how many automobiles are sold in 1932, we are storing up a big business for the future." Mr. Grant said. "There will be fewer automobiles sold in 1931 than will go to the scrap heap. With 12,000,000 car-years out of the inventory, nine percent more gasoline was used up to August 1. 1931, than was used in 1930. With fewer automobiles, the people must have been running them faster and longer to consume the additional gasoline. This means that we have some 22,000,000 people working hard to make a fine business for our industry when there is an economic recovery

No False Optimism

"I am not attempting to create any false optimism—I am not speaking without a statistical background. Using the best sense we can, we have drawn conclusions from the figures we have, and I am willing to make the statement that as far as the conduct of our business for the first half of 1932 is concerned, we shall set the indices somewhat higher than the actualities of 1931. We are willing to set our advertising budgets and our selling expense on that kind of indices. With economic conditions as they are, and since the obsolescence is so great and we have sunk so low in this year's sales, we figure that the first half of 1932 must necessarily be better than was the first half of 1931."

Total	$0.99

Would you like to have a dollar for every dinner you've cooked? "A dollar saved is a dollar earned"—so if you cultivate the dollar-dinner habit, you'll have a dollar for every dinner cooked. But your dollar dinner must be as delicious and as dietetically correct as the average two-dollar dinner, if it is to be a real saving. This can be attained by forethought in planning your menu. Above, is a model dollar dinner.

Lima Beans with Shrimp Cover: Drain one No. 2 can of lima beans and turn into a shallow buttered baking dish. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Drain one 5¾-ounce can of shrimps, and spread over the beans. Add two tablespoons of cream. Cover lightly with buttered crumbs and bake in a hot oven until brown on top.

Pear and Roquefort Salad with Crisp Crackers: Drain and chill half of a No. 2 can of pears; then place half a pear on each lettuce leaf. Crumble one-half wedge, or package, of Roquefort cheese over the top and sprinkle lightly with paprika. Pour over four tablespoons of French dressing. Serve with saltines crisped in the oven.*

Duck Season Opens Oct. 1

Hunters Should Learn New Regulations In Effect This Fall

Hunters in Holt and vicinity are awaiting the zero hour tomorrow at noon when the duck hunting season opens for a two-months period, coming to a close at sunset Nov. 30. Changes in the regulations should be noted by hunters.

The daily limit of 12 birds of any one, or 12 in the aggregate, of the following kinds of birds, is allowed: mallards, pintails, baldpates, mergansers, coots and widgeons. A daily limit of 10 of any of the following kinds or 10 in the aggregate of bluebills, green-wing, blue-wing and cinnamon teal, canvas-backs, redheads, ringnecks, shovelers and gadwalls has been set.

It is not permissible to take in any one day of the open season a mixed bag of more than 12 ducks and coots, or have in possession a mixed bag of more than 20 ducks and coots of all species.

The taking of wood ducks, ruddy ducks, buffleheads, eider ducks and swans, during the year 1932, is prohibited.

In keeping with the laws last year, hunters are forbidden to hunt from motor vehicles and must carry guns in motor vehicles either taken apart or in a case.

Hunters may secure small game hunting licenses from county auditors and designated places of business. The fee for resident small game hunting licenses is $1.00 while a charge of $25.00 is made for non-resident small game hunting licenses.

Bear Fatal for Two

Emerson, Man., Sept. 19—Two persons are dead here as a result of a farmyard battle with a black bear. The bear killed George Kawrilia, 65 year old farmer, and Mrs. Kawrilia died from the shock of witnessing her husband's death.

The bear came into the farmyard with cows which came home for milking. The farmer fired several charges from a shotgun and wounded the bear in the eyes and head. Kawrilia and his son then attempted to kill it with a knife.

With one vicious slash of his huge paw, however, the animal ripped open the farmer's abdomen and he died instantly.

The bear escaped into a swamp and was later found and killed.

Reports reached here recently that one of the Jung's Bakery trucks of Thief River Falls was destroyed by fire last Wednesday evening. A front tire blew out, throwing the truck into the ditch. Orvis Oien, the driver, escaped without injury.

The first concrete in the construction of the international traffic bridge to span the Rainy between Baudette and Rainy River was poured Wednesday (Sept. 20). The concrete was used in the abutment on the Baudette side of the bridge.—Baudette Region.

The sawmills of International Falls, idle since June, 1930, resumed operations recently, giving work to about 125 men. It is expected that the mills will run one shift steady for at least three months and all the logs in the lake and river will be sawed. —Warroad Pioneer.

Corn for Silage

The best stage at which to cut corn for silage and get the most feed value per acre is when the shuck first begins to turn yellow at the end of the ear and while the leaves are still green. The kernels should be dented and glazed.

Corn in the milk stage contains only about one-half the full feeding-value of the mature plant. When it is partly in the milk and partly glazed, or still not in the mature state, corn has 27 percent less feeding value than when at the proper stage of maturity to cut for silage.

Achievement Day for 4-H Club Went Over Great Last Friday

Calves and Club Members Paraded, the Band Marched and Played, the Crowd Cheered, and a Good Time Was Had By All

Last Friday occurred one of the most successful Achievement Day programs ever put on here. The weather was fine, being clear and sunny and not too warm, so a large crowd turned out to see the exhibits of the 4-H members of this community.

The program was put under way shortly after one o'clock at the village bandstand, where the band members rendered a few snappy pieces. The band then formed in marching order, four abreast, and led the 4-H Club procession to the schoolhouse, marching to the staccato rat-tat-tat of the trap drums and the bass drum. A rousing march was played on the way. Members of the 4-H Club bearing banners followed directly behind the band.

At the program in the schoolhouse, Supt. E. O. Nybakken acted as chairman, and gave the address of welcome. He conducted the proceedings very well, and kept the crowd in good humor by his ready wit.

Short talks were given by club leaders and members, which were applauded vigorously.

Einar Loven and his accordion then led the crowd in singing "The More We Get Together."

The principal talks were given by Harold Harrison of Warren, the county club leader, and H. A. Pflughoeft of the Northwest School of Agriculture, at Crookston. Judging entries in the 4-H Club projects, they said, is far from being a soft snap, especially where the entries are all good. In most cases the decisions are made only after an exhaustive analysis of each entry. Preparation of calves, pigs, etc., for fairs was also discussed.

A very fine piano and vocal selection was given by Alf. Sather of the school faculty.

The closing number was a cheer drill by the 4-H Club, led by Einar Loven.

After the program in the schoolhouse, the band led the procession up to the barn where the calves and sheep were kept. When they were brought out, the entire procession paraded through main street to the sound of the drums. A few selections were rendered by the band before the judging began.

The winners, as announced by Judges Harrison and Pflughoeft, are as follows:

Showmanship
  Louis Sagstuen
Dairy Calf
  Gertrude Voth, 1st
  Fredrick Voth, 2nd
  Irene Holst, 3rd
  Marlen Augustine, 4th

Thrift
  Eleanor Larson, 1st
First Year Sewing
  Eunice Lindholm, 1st
Second Year Sewing
  Vivian Larson, 1st
Baking
  Marion Larson, 1st
  Beatrice Larson, 2nd

After the judging, the members of the 4-H Club and the judges were guests of the Holt Commercial Club at a lunch at the ladies aids. Cash prizes were awarded by the Commercial Club.

It was unanimously agreed that this was the most successful event of the kind yet attempted in Holt. Votes of appreciation for their efforts to make this thing a success, are due to the 4-H members and leaders, the Commercial Club, the Community Band, and all others who participated.

Holt 4-H Members Win Prizes at County Achievement Day

The members of the Holt 4-H Club journeyed down to Warren on Saturday to attend the Marshall County 4-H Club Achievement Day, and carried off the American Legion trophy, awarded annually by Warren Post No. 27 to the club showing the most activity during the year.

The local club also carried off prizes in the Beef Calf class as follows:

Reuben Benitt, 1st; Lloyd Larson, 2nd; Martin Larson, 3rd; Olive Moberg, 4th; Louis Sagstuen, 5th; Margaret Sagstuen, 6th. All these won free trips to the Junior Livestock Show to be held at South St. Paul this fall.

Oscar Nohre won first and Marlen Augustine, third, with their potatoes.

Eunice Lindholm won first prizes with his laundry bag, gift article, night dress and darn.

This was a mighty fine showing for the local 4-H Club, to have them win 6 out of 16 free trips to So. St. Paul, and residents of this community ought to be proud.

The American Legion cup is on display in the front window of the Marshall County State Bank.

The weed burner on the Great Northern was here the forepart of the week.

We had a fine rain Sunday and Monday which helped prepare the ground for the fall plowing.

Blanchard-Evenson

On Saturday, Sept. 24, occurred the wedding of Miss Hermia Blanchard and Mr. Claude Evenson, both of Thief River Falls, at the home of Rev. O. J. Haukeness. The witnesses were Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Maijala.

Those present at the ceremony were the bride's mother, Mrs. Ingeborg Soastad, Mr. and Mrs. Christ Engen, Mrs. S. M. Brown of Hansboro, N. D., Bertha and Tauno Maijala. After the ceremony the newlyweds left by car on their honeymoon for Winnipeg and other points in Canada.

Census Shows Traffic Heavy

Count Reveals Fewer Out of State Cars, Home Travel Heavy

The average number of vehicles per day between Holt and Thief River Falls, according to 1932 Traffic Observations, was as follows: Passenger Cars, Minnesota, 495; Pass. Cars, foreign, 24; Busses, none; Transport Trucks, 2; Light Trucks, 17; Heavy Trucks, 38; Horse Drawn Vehicles, 3; Total, 579.

The observation point was north of the junction of T. H. 33 with T. H. 32, about half a mile north of Thief River Falls.

A similar observation one mile south of Greenbush on T. H. 32 disclosed the following daily averages:

Pass. Cars, Minn., 182; Pass. Cars, Foreign, 23; Busses, none; Transport Trucks, 8; Light Trucks, 7; Heavy Trucks, 20; Horse Drawn Vehicles, 2; Total, 242.

Travel on Minnesota trunk highways this year is decreased only eleven per cent as compared with last year, according to an announcement by Commissioner Babcock based on the traffic count made during the week of August first in which vehicular traffic of all kinds is recorded.

Passenger travel from Canadian provinces and other states of this country is shown to be approximately 25 per cent lighter than last summer; but Minnesota residents, according to the traffic census, are traveling their own highways, either for business or pleasure, to an extent almost equal to other years.

Counts were made at 394 points, as compared with 369 in 1931. Of these, 292 were made at identically the same points as last year, and decreases shown at 232. Increases in traffic this year were shown at 60 of the points where comparison was possible.

Traffic at 133 points on paved highways averaged 1,719 vehicles per day for the seven days.

News Review of Current Events the World Over

Startling Victory of Democrats in the Maine Election—Hoover Calls for Big Budget Cuts—Von Papen Triumphs Over Reichstag.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

GREAT rejoicing among the Democrats, and corresponding dismay in the Republican camps. Maine, normally a rock-ribbed Republican state, has gone Democratic, and everyone is quoting the old adage: "As Maine goes, so goes the Nation." Whether or not that is true, this September election certainly gives immense encouragement to the supporters of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Nor did the Hoover forces attempt to minimize its importance.

Louis J. Brann

For the first time in 18 years Maine chose a Democrat for governor. He is Louis J. Brann, mayor of Lewiston, whose plurality over Burleigh Martin was nearly 1,400. The Democrats also elected two out of three congressmen the victors being Edward C. Moran, Jr., Rockland insurance agent who twice ran for governor, and John G. Utterback, an automobile dealer who was once reform mayor of Bangor. Congressman Carroll L. Beedy, Republican, was reelected in the First district.

Republican National Chairman Everett Sanders sent a reassuring telegram to President Hoover, but the Chief Executive was not to be deceived. His reply wire said:

"The result of the election in Maine imposes need for renewed and stronger effort that the people may fully understand the issues at stake. We have known all along that, owing to the ravages of the world depression, our fight is a hard one; but we have a strong case and a right cause. Our task is to acquaint every man and woman in the country with the facts and issues which confront the nation."

"We are greatly disappointed," admitted Vice President Curtis. "But it will only make us work the harder, and we will carry Maine in November."

Democratic Chairman Farley grinned exultantly as he said he was impatiently awaiting a Republican explanation of the Democratic victory in Maine.

"The Democrats do not concede a single state," he added. "I think it must be admitted by Mr. Hoover's supporters that in this particular commonwealth the Democratic prospects were no better, to put it mildly, than in the least promising (from our point of view) of the so-called doubtful states. Maine was no harder hit by the depression than the rest of the country and had no more reason to resent the evasive policies of the administration."

PRIMARIES were held in various states during the week. In Michigan Gov. Wilber M. Brucker, Republican, easily won renomination and Representatives Walcott and Person also were victors. The Democrats named W. A. Comstock for governor. Senators George H. Moses of New Hampshire and Porter Dale of Vermont were renominated by the Republicans, as was Senator E. D. Smith by the Democrats of South Carolina, Cole Blease being rejected. In Louisiana Representative John H. Overton, friend of Senator Huey Long, defeated Senator Broussard who sought renomination.

MR. HOOVER poked a stick into a hornet's nest when he made public the report of Attorney General William D. Mitchell on the bonus army and the regrettable incident of its ousting from Washington. Mitchell said his investigators found that most of the B. E. F. members were honest, earnest and law abiding, but that perhaps a quarter of them were criminals, many were radicals, many were arrant fakers, and the worst were among those who were evicted by troops with tear gas and flames. The attorney general defended the manner of eviction and the conduct of the troops used, and the President said: "This report should correct the many misstatements of fact as to this incident with which the country has been flooded."

Att'y Gen. Mitchell

But many newspapers and individuals, hotly discussing the report, declared it was misleading generally and absolutely false in certain vital parts; and it is a question whether it did not still further alienate a considerable part of the body of war veterans from support of the administration. Of course, it was one of the major topics of talk among the members of the American Legion when they assembled in Portland.

Of greater importance to the Legionnaires than this affair was the demand for immediate cash payment of the bonus. The resolution calling for this was adopted by a vote of 1,167 to 109 after a noisy debate. The delegates thus disregarded the warnings of President Hoover and General Hines, director of the veterans' bureau, that the payment would cost the treasury between two and two and one-half billion dollars and impose an intolerable burden on taxpayers.

Other resolutions adopted called for repeal of the Eighteenth amendment and immediate modification of the Volstead act, opposed cancellation of foreign war debts and favored adequate national defense. Chicago was selected for the 1933 convention, and Louis A. Johnson of Clarksburg, W. Va., was elected national commander.

HOW the problem of intergovernmental debts may best be solved is the puzzling question that is now being considered by a new organization of business leaders of the nation, seventy-six men prominent in industry, agriculture and labor. Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., president of General Motors, is the chairman, and the vice chairmen include Henry A. Wallace, farm paper publisher of Des Moines; Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia university; James M. Cox, former governor of Ohio; John W. Davis, former ambassador to Great Britain; Frank O. Lowden, former governor of Illinois; E. A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau federation, and Louis Tabor, master of the National grange.

A. P. Sloan, Jr.

Mr. Sloan's new forum, it is announced, will devote itself to "mobilizing practical opinion" on the international debts question.

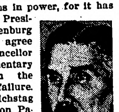
PRESIDENT HOOVER started off the week well by calling on the heads of departments and the executives of all other federal activities to cut out all non-essentials from budget requests for the next fiscal year. The President said he had requested Director of the Budget Roop "to make every effort to secure a reduction of at least $500,000,000 in the estimates of appropriations for the next year from the appropriations made for the current year, and the co-operation of the responsible administrative officers is necessary to achieve this end. A part of this can be accomplished in reduction of construction, activities which have been so greatly speeded up during the past few years as an aid to employment."

From administration sources it was learned the President hoped the total budget reduction might be $800,000,000.

Just before sending his message to department heads, the President announced that the government would go ahead with that portion of the construction program which the relief act made contingent on the ability of the treasury to raise the necessary money. He said he had instructed the various departments to speed up the program by the amount of slightly less than $200,000,000.

On Tuesday the War department, to advance the government's employment relief efforts, approved a great construction program that calls for the expenditure of $41,577,260 on flood control and rivers and harbors projects. The department expects these activities will provide work for 25,000 persons now jobless.

THOUGH supported by only one-fifteenth of the reichstag, the government of Chancellor Von Papen of Germany remains in power, for it has the backing of President Von Hindenburg who seems to agree with the chancellor that parliamentary government in the reich is a failure. When the reichstag met Monday Von Papen tried to read the command for its dissolution given him by the president, but Herman Goering, the Nazi president of the parliament, refused to recognize him until after a vote of non-confidence in the government had been moved by a Nazi and carried by an overwhelming majority.

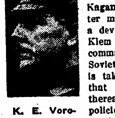


Von Papen

Von Papen walked out, leaving the decree of dissolution on Goering's desk. That gentleman announced it was not valid since the reichstag had already overthrown the cabinet. Later he admitted that both the dissolution and the vote of non-confidence were legal, after being rebuked by the president for his action. Government officials said there would be new elections within sixty days, according to the constitution, but the Deutsches Zeitung, mouthpiece of the government, said: "There will be no new elections—no decision on a date of election is expected in the near future."

AS WAS forecast a week ago, France rejected the German demand for equality of armaments, though in a conciliatory way, asserting that the other allied nations and also the United States would have to assent to the proposal before it could be granted. Chancellor Von Papen thereupon announced that German delegates would not attend further sessions of the disarmament conference, which reassembled Wednesday.

FROM Riga comes the interesting statement that Josef Stalin, dictator of Soviet Russia, has lost his influence and before long will be replaced as secretary of the Communist party—the only office he holds—by M. L. Kaganovich. This latter man, however, is a devoted disciple of Klem E. Voroshilov, commander of the Soviet armies, so it is taken for granted that Voroshilov will thereafter direct the policies of the Communist party and of the nation.



K. E. Voroshilov

Stalin's reign, it is said, is being brought to a close because of failure of the five-year plan to industrialize the country, coupled with the growing shortage of food, which is causing workers everywhere to desert the industrial undertakings and return to the villages.

Another reason for the fall of the dictator is said to be Moscow's hope to obtain American recognition by a radical change of internal policy. Voroshilov is anxious to obtain America as an ally against Japan, whose plans, Russians fear, threaten Siberia.

MANCHOUKUO, the "independent" state set up by Japan in Manchuria, is now a full-fledged nation for Japan gave it recognition by signing a protocol Thursday at Changchun, which city was re-named Hsinching, meaning "New Capital." There was great rejoicing in Tokyo and a display of intense resentment in Chinese cities.

CHILE narrowly escaped another revolution during the week. A military clique led by Col. Arturo Benitez, air force commander, served notice on Carlos Davila, the Socialist President and former ambassador to Washington, that unless he resigned the Presidential palace would be bombed or attacked by troops. The clique already had forced the resignation of the cabinet, and the men and planes of the air corps gathered at Santiago ready for action. So Davila gracefully stepped down and out, saying he would leave Chile and probably would seek a job in journalism in some other country.

GATHERED in Sioux City for the purpose of considering the needs of the farmers, governors and other representatives of nine middle western states outlined a proposed federal program for financial aid to farmers. Among other things they suggested tariff revision to protect farm products, "sound" expansion of currency, Reconstruction Finance corporation loans to farmers, a moratorium on farm mortgage foreclosures and crop surplus control legislation.

This program seemed fairly satisfactory to the farmers who were on "strike," and there was an immediate decrease in the picketing that had kept much farm produce out of several large cities, especially in Iowa.

FOR several days it was believed the "Flying Family," made up of Mr. and Mrs. George R. Hutchinson, their two small daughters and a crew of four, had perished off the coast of Greenland on their flight by stages to Europe. Their huge amphibian plane was forced down and smashed in the ice, but all of them were found alive and unhurt in an Eskimo settlement and were taken to Angmagsalik by the British trawler Lord Talbot. The projected flight of the Hutchinsons over Greenland and Iceland was not approved by the Danish government, and the taking of the children has been severely criticized.

RECEIVERS for the Insull Utility Investments, Inc., report to Federal Judge Lindley in Chicago that the concern is hopelessly insolvent, its assets being $27,473,364 and its liabilities $253,984,341. Aside from the $148,000,000 which 51,678 persons invested in the stock of the corporation and lost, there still remains a deficit of $78,474,403.

That apparently wipes out the purchasers of $53,645,028 of debenture bonds in the company, with still a deficit of nearly $20,000,000. That is nearly half of what the bankers loaned the corporation.

FOUR years ago John D. Rockefeller, Jr., conceived the idea of restoring the old town of Williamsburg, Va., to the conditions of colonial days. The first step in the project, the restoration of the historic Raleigh tavern, has been completed, and the structure, rebuilt on the original site and furnished in the style in vogue 150 years ago, was opened to the public on Friday. This one item has cost more than $200,000 of the $5,000,000 Mr. Rockefeller has contributed for the entire work.

Close by the tavern, which is situated on the Duke of Gloucester street, is the old Colonial Capitol building, another of the structure which has been included in the restoration plan and which is now nearing completion.

Glenwood—Two local youths and a pilot were killed instantly when an airplane crashed two miles east of here. The boys were being given a ride as their pay for passing out handbills. They were Lawrence Austin 17, and Sidney Thompson 18. The pilot was Ray Dibble 35 of Graceville.

SEEKS A FORMULA FOR FINDING FEES

Writer Would Have Fog of Doubt Dispelled.

"Gentlemen," said George B. Caltious, at the weekly meeting of the Rowanis club, "I do not know when anything has intrigued me as has the formula to be applied to all salaries of state officials, employees and appointees, so that they may understand and realize what they will be paid in the future. I had thought at first that this formula was something thought up by the state board of accounts, or some other accounting organization, but they tell me that it is written into the law. If, for example, you are drawing pay from the great state of Indiana, and you wish to know how much you will obtain, after the cuts authorized by the general assembly have been applied, the law takes you by the hand, leads you to a pad and pencil, and thereby directs what you must do.

"You divide your annual salary by 100. Then you multiply the result by .0025. Subtract the answer you obtained from .99. Your next step is to multiply the figure so reached by the total annual salary, and the result will be the new annual salary. Now, then, I will admit that this looks simple, at least to a certified accountant. But when I endeavored to see how it worked out I was led to believe that it is not as simple as it looks. I took a salary of $1,200 a year because that seemed easy. Then I applied the formula, went through the various steps, and got $269 as the amount anybody who had been getting $100 a month would receive hereafter. By reference to the corrected salary table I learned that the amount I should have figured was $1,152. Where I made my mistake I have not been able to determine. I asked a gentleman who was familiar with the work of the legislature each day it was in special session. He said the formula was a simple thing to work. 'I suspect,' he said, 'that you did not subtract properly. You know you must take a four place decimal from a three place decimal.' Perhaps he was right. I would not venture to say. All I know is that whenever I took the legal formula and worked the problem over I got a different result. At any rate, I could not accuse the procedure of inducing monotony.

"One trouble about these simple formulae is that they invariably bring about the asking of additional questions. We cannot, or will not, take a plain statement of fact and let it go at that. We insist that it be repeated. Recently I was waiting to ask a question at the Union station information window. A woman just in front of me asked what time the next Monon train left for Chicago. She was told, whereupon I expected her to move out of the way. Instead she asked again, and was given the same information. She inquired if the clerk was sure, and he said he was. She informed him that she had been thinking all the while that the train left an hour later. He said such a conclusion was erroneous. Then she brought forth her contract and repeated the original information. He repeated it for her, and then she repeated it again. Eventually, with doubt on her face, she left the window. I am confident she thought the clerk was wrong.

"I feel the same way about this formula for salary fixing. I have been told that it is the law, that it is simple and that a child could operate it. But the longer I work at it the more I am convinced there is a joke about it somewhere. A friend says it can be worked by algebra, but that is no comfort to me. I am inclined to think that if it read more in the form of a recipe for cooking something that it might be understandable. Suppose the law read in this fashion: Divide the annual salary by 100. Add the white of two eggs, and beat briskly until the salary has attained a rich, brown color. Multiply the result by .0025. Breathe deeply for five minutes, with all windows open. Stir until the mixture comes to a boil, then drain through a bit of cheesecloth. Subtract the answer from .99. Add diced carrots, a pinch of paprika and a trace of chives. Roll as in biscuit dough and shorten to suit. Multiply the figure so reached by the total annual salary, and the result will be the new annual salary. Serve chilled and garnish with a sprig of parsley."—Indianapolis News.

Want "Ad" Jogs Memory

Unusual was the public announcement that appeared in the London papers recently. The Hungarian minister, Baron Ivan Rubido-Zichy, inserted this advertisement: "The Hungarian minister regrets that, having lost his engagement book, he is unable to remember his engagements for next week, and would, therefore, be grateful for reminders." Luckily three persons who had invited him to dinner on various nights telephoned to remind him of the dates, and as for the rest of the engagements he remembered them.

What Illinois Has

On the Illinois River Above Alton.

Prepared by National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.—WNU Service.

WITH the opening of the Century of Progress exposition at Chicago in 1933, the city and the state of Illinois will be hosts to thousands of visitors.

Not many decades ago all Illinois was forest-clad; her roads were Indian trails; her buildings tepees and pioneer huts.

Then the pioneers and woodsmen pushed from the east in growing numbers. They came in flatboats and covered wagons. Later they came by steamboat and railroad. Today the old routes of the earliest pioneers echo with the hum of airplanes.

Nature endowed the state with a fertile soil to nourish mankind and stored treasures of minerals beneath to feed man's machines of travel and industry. More than all, it blessed the state with a rugged, healthful climate, which plays so large a part in fixing the temperament and destiny of peoples and nations. What man has made of these factors is the story of Illinois today.

Glimpse it for a moment as from an airplane winging northward, over crisscrossed arteries of concrete and steel and water, with towns and villages knotting them into a network. Forests and orchards of fruit give way to somber mines of coal. The earth is carpeted for miles with waving corn. Cities and tall stacks of mills become thicker. There is a broad belt of green pastures alive with dairy herds. Then comes a great, throbbing city under a pall of smoke, with humanity snuggling closer and climbing higher. Here acres of emerald parks intersperse drab-roofed squares, and finally a burst of graceful towers edges an inland sea.

Every village, every hamlet, has its story, some in the dim past, others in the thriving present. Traces of colonial days are few in Illinois, and towns show true to type, as one rolls over the smooth concrete highways. But each adds its mite of story, and there is no easier way to see them than by jogging north, over the aptly named Meridian highway, through the center of the state, 385 miles from southern tip to northern border.

From South to North.

In the course of this journey the traveler will see the aspect of nature change as in few other states. In "Egypt"—so named by the pioneers because of its fertility—pecans, cotton, tobacco, magnolias, bald cypress, and lotus are growing; in the north sugar beets, hickory, tamarack, and forests of white pine brave the biting winter. Most of Kentucky and Virginia are north of Cairo, while Boston is farther south than Zion. In the south the frost is usually gone by the end of March; in the north it keeps the farmer guessing until May.

The proposed trip will be an easy one, for no other state has more miles of concrete roads. The automobilist who starts his car in New York, heads across the continent to Seattle, down the Pacific coast to Los Angeles, over the wide open spaces to New Orleans, and then back through Richmond and Washington, will have covered less than 8,000 miles that are paved with cement concrete in Illinois. In one year more paved highway was added than the distance from Chicago to Portland, Maine, and 2,500 men and 10,000 horses were employed at the task.

Cairo is both the southern tip and within a few miles of the lowest spot in Illinois, only 279 feet above sea level. It is a city rich in memories. There Gen. Ulysses S. Grant had his headquarters from September, 1861, to April, 1862.

When the Illinois Central railroad pushed across the state, Cairo, satisfied that the Ohio river never could be bridged, saw itself a metropolis where trains and boats would always meet. Charles Dickens was one who bought a lot in the city of dreams. Before he crossed from England and made the journey west to see it, the temperamental river had moved and it was far beneath the water. He blamed Cairo, and Cairo has never forgiven him for what he wrote.

Cairo a Transfer Point.

Few of the graceful old river steamers remain, both rivers have been bridged, and Cairo lives in another age. It is a transfer point between water and rail for the government barge line to New Orleans and, in winter, the northern terminal. A single tow of long, squat barges with a powerful tug can carry the grain produced on 18,000 acres. They bring up the products of the Southern states and of distant lands—sugar, coffee, bauxite, sulphur, burlap, sisal—and carry back the grain and manufactures of the Middle West. Like the pirogues and flatboats from Illinois, which 80 years ago drifted down the river with flour, smoked meat, and corn juice "moonshine," these steel barges plod eight miles an hour—no faster than Marquette paddled in his birch canoe. But the rattle of the electric truck has replaced the song of the roustabout, and one close-tied fleet of barges carries the freight of a dozen splashing river boats.

The highway leaves Cairo, curving through the Ozarks. Back in the hills, families are living in primitive log cabins. "Egypt's" fields of cotton, which dare frost but escape the boll weevil, change around Anna into orchards of apples, peaches, and pears and beds of asparagus and strawberries.

Beauty spots are preserved as state forests and parks. Bald Knob, 1,030 feet high, crowns a hardwood tract. Another reserve contains the only stand of short-leaf pine in the state. Fern Cliff park has a wealth of fern-covered bowlders and waterfalls, and in Giant City park nature has lined great square rocks like streets. At Tunnel Hill the Illinois Central has bored a 7,000-foot tunnel as part of the 169-mile cutoff between Edgewood, Ill., and Fulton, Ky.

Crucible clay of the highest grade comes from around Carbondale, north of Anna, and 54 of the 102 counties in Illinois produce coal, most of which is mined in adjacent Franklin and Williamson counties.

Through the Coal Fields.

Marion, where Robert G. Ingersoll studied to be a lawyer and where Gen. John A. Logan made the speech which kept southern Illinois in the Union, is 19 miles east. Near it is the town once known as "bloody" Herrin. Politics has changed and the barber shops and stores now have signs in their windows, "This place will be closed at noon for prayer."

Benton is farther north, over a straight seam of coal from 7 to 14 feet thick, estimated to contain two and a half billion tons. It is the center of vast mines, five of which in different years have held world records for production. Orient No. 2, at West Frankfort, often bringing to the surface between 14,000 and 15,000 tons a day, is one of the largest coal mines in the world. It is electrically equipped, and its lock rooms and baths for miners, a requirement under the state law, could lave a regiment from black to white without overcrowding. The deepest bituminous mine shaft in the country, more than 1,000 feet, is near Assumption.

Adventurers searching for gold have settled continents, but the lasting prosperity of nations rests on structural material and baser ores—coal, iron, oil, copper, limestone, and the humble clay and sand. Pennsylvania and West Virginia, and in some years Kentucky, produce more coal than Illinois; but they rank below it in untouched deposits of bituminous.

Our automobile highway now crosses the almost-forgotten trail followed by Col. George Rogers Clark in 1778. Patrick Henry sent this youth of twenty-five and a band of Kentucky frontiersmen to establish the vast Northwest territory as part of Virginia. They came down the Ohio and unfurled the Stars and Stripes, for the first time in Illinois, over Fort Massac, now a park.

Grain and Oil.

Fields of wheat and oats alternate with corn, and oil replaces coal under the surface, as the road runs north through Centralia. Oil was discovered in Clark county 26 years ago, and once the state produced more oil than Pennsylvania. It still produces some 6,000,000 barrels a year, but it is as a refining and distribution center that Illinois is most important to the oil industry. The pipe line radiate to the Atlantic, the gulf, and Canada from Wood river and Roxana.

One of these lines follows the old trail of the covered wagon between Vincennes and Cahokia. The first mail in Illinois came along this route in 1805. Towns were spaced off every 25 miles, which then was a good day's journey.

At Olney is one of the five game havens in the state and the home of the late Robert Ridgway, formerly curator of the division of birds in the United States National museum, and a world authority on these feathered creatures. With 365 varieties, he rated Illinois rich in bird life.

Returning to the north-to-south highway, we come to Vandalia, due north of Centralia. Here is the old State Capitol building of 1820-1837, later a county courthouse, and now a museum. Its architecture of a past age contrasts with the drab two-story buildings around the Vandalia city square.

Find Records of Stern Greek Law

Two pieces of pottery on which votes were inscribed which sent Aristides and Themistocles, Greek political and military leaders, into temporary exiles 240 years ago have been found in the ancient market place at Athens, Greece.

Citizens of Athens during the Fifth century B. C., were privileged under the constitution of the city to meet in public assembly and vote for the temporary banishment of any of the citizenry. If as many as 6,000 votes were cast in the ballot, the citizen receiving the largest number was exiled for ten years but not deprived of the enjoyment of his property.

At least eight Athenian leaders are known to have been ostracized, but votes cast in the ballots have only been found for four of the proceedings.

The above mentioned "ostracon," Greek term for the ballots so used, which was cast against Aristides is the first of its kind ever discovered but the one with the name of Themistocles is the second found. Ostraca have now been found for the votes against Megagles in 487 B. C., Xanthippos, father of Pericles in 485 B. C., Aristides in 483 B. C., and Themistocles in 471 B. C.

Penalty of Success

"Success knows no eight-hour law."

William C. Durant, the automobile magnate, was speaking on success at a Kiwanis picnic in Boston.

"Yes," he went on, "success, like failure, has its penalties. The Sinnicksons, for instance, ran a small boarding house, Wave villa, at Ocean City last year, and their success was very great. One afternoon when Mr. Sinnickson came home from the fish market Mrs. Sinnickson said to him:

"'I've rented the coalbin to old Jake Hodge, Joe. The rest of the season you'll have to sleep in the chickenhouse. I'm sure you won't mind the chickens.'"

The teacher was testing the knowledge of a kindergarten class. Slapping a half-dollar on the desk, she said sharply:

"What is that?"

Instantly, a voice from the back row, "Tails."

Explaining the Sign

Near Cleveland, Ohio, a man noticed a store with a neatly painted sign on the front window reading: "We dress all our own poultry." Below this sign in the window were displayed summer dresses, hosiery and other women's apparel. The mystery was solved when it was discovered that a meat store had just moved out and dress shop had just moved in.

Nation's Largest Ranch

The largest singly owned ranch in the United States is the King's ranch, at Kingsville, Texas, which comprises 1,280,000 acres of land. This ranch borders the Gulf of Mexico for 100 miles and more than 100,000 calves are branded on it each season. Kingsville is a town of about 5,000 people and is the center of this vast estate, which is largely supported by the industries of the ranch.—Washington Star.

Home Baking Now Greatly Simplified

By the development of a new type of flour—GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Flour—baking has been remarkably simplified for the housewife. And the cause of most baking disappointments banished—lack of uniformity in the flour used; the chance of two sacks of the same brand varying greatly in results.

GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Flour means flour that has been tested in a home oven, just like yours, for uniformity of results, before it goes to you. Every batch tested for home baking of cakes, pies, pastries, breads, by a number of experts directed by the noted cooking authority, Betty Crocker.

"Kitchen-tested" Recipes are likewise "Kitchen-tested" scientifically the same way. Thus the flour acts the same way, the recipes the same way every time you bake. No guesswork, no uncertainty. Results are unvarying. Baking simplified amazingly.

For the Great Kitchen Thrill, try this way today. Get GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Flour at any grocery store. The "Kitchen-tested" Recipes For Foods Men Like—including the one for Pigs in Blankets—are inside the sack.

Lights of NEW YORK

By WALTER TRUMBULL

Any visitor to Greater New York should be amply repaid by a trip to the Children's museum, which is affiliated with the Brooklyn Institute. They say it was visited by no less than 680,000 children in 1931. All those things concerning which youngsters are curious, the things which stir their imagination, are portrayed here, mostly in miniature. There is, for example, a miniature volcano and a miniature mine. The museum also goes in for educational games. Pictures from such magazines as the National Geographic are mounted and cut up into jigsaw puzzles. When the child has assembled one of these, pride in the achievement usually induces the reading of the short explanation attached to the picture. There are long tables so that many children can do puzzles at the same time. This game not only teaches them a bit concerning places and things, but trains them to co-ordinate hands, eyes and brains.

Captain Dingle, who writes all those stories of the sea, lives in England. He went ashore in some boat he owned, and lost not only the craft itself, but a large snake skin, which he had wrapped around the lower part of his mast. As he and John Oliver La Gorce had a common interest, in that both knew a lot concerning Andros Island, Captain Dingle wrote Doctor La Gorce frequently. One letter told of his loss and asked if anybody had any loose boa constrictor skins. It happened that on one of his many trips to distant places Doctor La Gorce had picked up that very article. He never had used it much as there didn't appear to be any real place for it around the house, and he didn't have a boat. But it was a swell snake skin and he shipped it to Captain Dingle.

• • •

Having performed this kindly act, John La Gorce got to worrying a little. After all, he had been the possessor of that snake skin for several years and perhaps it was a bit rusty. He didn't want to become known as a man who would send a friend the second-hand epidermis of a serpent. Perhaps he should first have sent it to the cleaner and presser, or had it simonized. It got so on his mind that he wrote to several boa constrictor dealers in various parts of the world, told them his story and gave them Captain Dingle's address. Then he felt free to turn his attention to other matters.

Within a reasonable time, Doctor La Gorce received another message from Captain Dingle. It didn't even contain ten words, reading merely:

"Have quit drinking. House is full of snakes."

They tell me that about the only place in the United States which stands for taxation without representation is the District of Columbia. The citizens of Washington have no vote and no representation in congress, but they pay taxes, plenty. The Capitol city is run by a commission of three and a police superintendent, but nothing can be done—not so much as repairing a hole in the pavement—without a congressional appropriation. It was only a short time ago that an act of congress was required to permit the delivery of ice cream in two-quart containers, some past act having specified that ice cream should be delivered only in one-quart receptacles.

SONG OF PETE THE PRAIRIE DOG

Out on the desert one night in June
The prairie dogs gathered beneath the moon
From out of their holes both far and near
They ran like lightning the ground to clear.
The jack rabbits too, were there indeed,
They covered the ground with swiftest speed.
The sand on the desert lay white and dry
The prairie dogs hearts beat hard—oh my!
For this was the night of the cactus bloom
That sealed their fate and marked their doom.
The little brown owls who blinked away
Had almost nothing of hope to say.
They sat on the tops of the prairie dogs' holes
And wished for a chance to save their souls.
While up in the sky the hawks drew near Hungry for prairie dog meat—I fear.
"Oh, what shall we do, we do, we do?"
The prairie dogs chattered and sighed out too.
But then in the distance out there arose
A fury that altered the prairie dog's woes.
A wind was coming that brewed no good,
Except as the jack rabbits understood—
And the jack rabbit's whiskers twitched in relief
And the joy of the owls was past belief.
Hurrah! Hurrah! now this was the thing
To turn the tables on hawks on wing—
The sand storm gathered, and raged for days
The hawks, discouraged, flew separate ways—
And again—The prairie dog town was still
With the peace of the desert on every hill.

How It Started

By Jean Newton

How It Came to Be "Sirloin"

THERE is a delightful story to the effect that once upon a time, an English king, in gustatory appreciation of the delicacy we know as sirloin conferred knighthood upon a loin of beef—and that ever after it lived happily under the name of sirloin (Sir Loin.).

It may be painful to some of us to have this beautiful fairy tale debunked, but truth is ruthless and respects neither tradition nor theory.

Had this incident really occurred the probability is that the word sirloin would have been still-born, for slang seldom outlives the occasion of its creation. It is a rare etymological tid-bit indeed that so tickles our intellectual palate as to become a permanent feature of our language menu.

Sirloin is really a mispelling of "surloin," (sur meaning above). Hence the word is self-explanatory.

The Kitchen Cabinet

Dainty Company Dishes

THERE are times when serving a luncheon for friends, one likes something different and good. The food which appeals to most palates is chicken in some form for the hot dish or salad.

Chicken Breasts With Cream Mushroom Sauce.—Steam the chickens until very tender. Remove the breasts, separating the small fillet and saute lightly in butter, seasoning with white pepper. Serve each breast topped with a small fillet and covered with cream mushroom sauce. Garnish with cress and very large stuffed raisins or ripe olives.

Cream Mushroom Sauce.—Scald one cupful of milk and one cupful of cream. Thicken with two tablespoonfuls each of flour and butter well blended. Season with salt, pepper, and a dash or two of paprika. Add a pimento mashed fine and one-half pound of sauted mushrooms.

Broiled Fillets of Beef.—Trim small fillets into rounds two inches thick and wrap with a thin slice of salt pork, tie or fasten with toothpick—do not skewer through the fillet. Season with a little pepper and serve with parsley butter poured over the fillets. Serve with potato balls rolled in butter and sprinkled with paprika.

Cheese Ring.—Soak one tablespoonful of gelatin in one-fourth of a cupful of cold milk. Whip one cupful of cream, add five tablespoonfuls of rich, yellow cheese (grated), one teaspoonful of worcestershire sauce, one-half teaspoonful of mustard, one teaspoonful of salt, one-eighth teaspoonful of cayenne and one-fourth teaspoonful of paprika. Dissolve the gelatin and add to the cream mixture. Mold in a ring. Unmold and fill the center with a crisp green salad; serve with a french dressing.

Baked Tomatoes.—Put six peeled ripe tomatoes in a deep glass baking dish. Sprinkle lightly with salt and pepper, add one and one-half cupfuls of sugar and fill in between the tomatoes with soft crumbs from the center of the loaf. Mix one cupful of bread crumbs with one-quarter cupful of melted butter and cover the tomatoes. Bake in a moderate oven for one and one-half hours. Serve from the dish.

Scottie Decorated for Loyalty

Scottie, the collie which has led W. R. Duckett, blind fur dealer of Franklin, Neb., to classes in the Columbia university summer session in New York for three summers, received a medal from the New York Anti-Vivisection society in recognition of his services. His master received a M. A. degree at the closing session of Columbia. The medal, which makes Scottie one of a group of about 50 canines in the country to be admitted to the Legion of Hero Dogs, was presented to him by Mrs. Diana Belais, president.

Village Smithy Now Operates Welding Shop

Mason City, Mich.—Jack Fowler, who has not shod a horse in 11 years, is still Mason's village blacksmith.

With the passing of horses, Fowler declares, he was forced to adapt his shop for modern day needs. He now operates a welding establishment, but in one corner he has an anvil, forge, and steel vise stored, which, he says, "are to remind him of olden days."

Fowler came to Michigan 60 years ago and began the blacksmith trade when eighteen years old in a shack which was situated on what is now the site of the Ingham county jail here. At that time, he said, there were seven other blacksmiths in Mason.

John Smith

By JANE OSBORN

© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate. (WNU Service)

AT THE informal little dance in the club house that night Madge Upton was fully aware that a certain rather nice looking young man, apparently a stranger, was trying to get up enough courage to ask her for a dance. Madge was rather pleased to notice that he did not dance, though it would have been easy enough for him to introduce himself to some of the other men who would present him to more girls than he could possibly dance with. Madge watched him as she danced with the other men. And then she saw him walking toward the door that led out of the club house she said to the very young man with whom she was dancing:

"Oh, please excuse me, just a minute. There goes Mr. Smith, I want to speak to him before he goes."

The very young man released his timorous hold of Madge's slender waist and she danced her way between swaying couples to the young man in question.

"Oh, Mr. Smith, I want to speak to you. You are Mr. Smith, aren't you?"

Much to her surprise the young man said he was. She had intended to say that an aunt by marriage, she didn't want to make the connection too close, had told her that a certain young man named John Smith was going to stop at the hotel and would go over to the club house and had asked her to look for him. She had expected the young man would say that his name was not Smith but that he wished it were, and then she would say she was so sorry she had made the mistake—and he would say he was glad she had, and then she would smile and he would ask her to dance—and after that they would be as well acquainted as if he really were named Smith and her aunt had really asked her to look out for him.

"I have been wondering if you weren't the girl," said Mr. Smith. "You see my aunt said she had heard your aunt speak of you and that you were here and your aunt said she would speak to you about me. My name is John—John Smith."

"And mine is Madge Upton—"

"May I have this dance—or what there is left of it?" he said.

Madge was spending the summer holidays with a married sister who had a cottage at the summer resort not far from the hotel where John Smith was staying, and it was quite natural that thereafter Madge and John should spend much time together—natural for John since he was a stranger and natural for Madge since his only serious competitor for Madge's society was the eighteen-year-old Walter.

There were wonderful mornings spent together in the surf, afternoons sailing in Madge's catboat on the bay—evenings dancing together at the club house. Madge introduced John Smith to some of the other girls, but always with a "keep your hands off my property" sort of way, and she never planned any parties where John might get acquainted with them.

Incidentally John fell in love with Madge. He had come to the Marden hotel merely as a resting place in his trip by motor to a spot some two hundred miles further along the shore, where he intended to spend his three weeks of vacation. After he had dined he had strolled over to the club house, when the clerk at the hotel had told him that guests there had the privilege. He hadn't intended to stay, but sight of Madge made him linger.

Then one day—three days before the end of his vacation—he felt that the time had come to tell Madge that he loved her. He was somewhat troubled as he faced the ordeal.

They were sitting on the beach under the protection of Madge's enormous beach parasol which shielded them from the gaze of chance passers-by. Really a very appropriate—if not entirely original-setting for the important declaration.

Reversing the order of procedure that he had planned John Smith first told Madge that he loved her—and asked her to marry him. He was then ready for his confession—but Madge got ahead of him with hers.

"I did a perfectly dreadful thing," she said. "I wanted to know you so much that I made up about my aunt—I've never mentioned her since for fear you would find out I had deceived you. It just happened that I hit the right name—but then Smith is not unusual."

"Still it is not my real name," said her companion. "As a matter of fact my name is Archibald Pepperell—I said I was John Smith for fear—" but the erstwhile John did not finish.

"Not Archibald Pepperell. You don't mean that you are the nephew of Mrs. Gordon Burke—"

"The same Archibald," he said.

"And Mrs. Burke is my aunt's very best friend—I've heard a lot about you—and all the time we have been both bluffing we might have been properly introduced."

"Then maybe you'll forgive me," suggested Archibald. "Maybe you'll marry me after all."

"Well, of course," said Madge, "I was rather counting on being Mrs. John Smith for life—not so easy to say Mrs. Archibald Pepperell, I'd always have to spell it out when I have things sent, still—"

But Madge got no further with her objections.

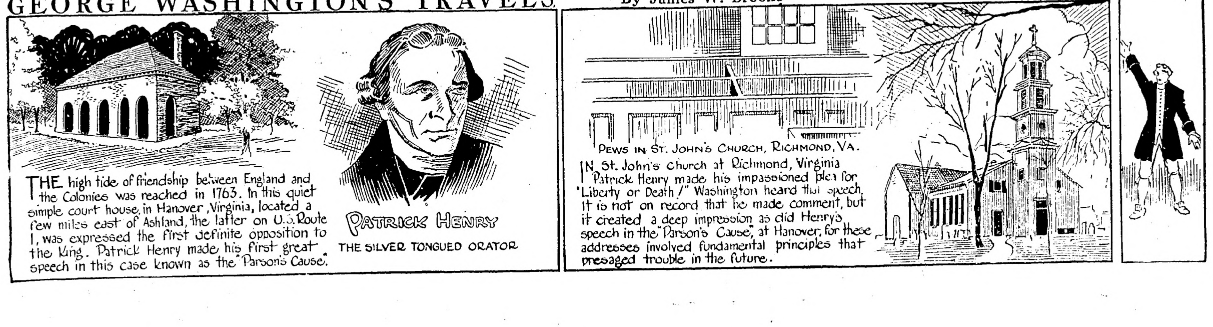
Historically Correct Sketches By CALVIN FADER



THE high tide of friendship between England and the Colonies was reached in 1763. In this quiet simple court house, in Hanover, Virginia, located a few miles east of Ashland, the latter on U.S. Route 1, was expressed the first definite opposition to the King. Patrick Henry made his first great speech in this case known as the "Parson's Cause."

PEWS IN ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, RICHMOND, VA.

IN St. John's Church at Richmond, Virginia Patrick Henry made his impassioned plea for "Liberty or Death!" Washington heard that speech. It is not on record that he made comment, but it created a deep impression as did Henry's speech in the "Parson's Cause," at Hanover, for these addresses involved fundamental principles that presaged trouble in the future.

—15—

"Sure enough. But we're hot on the trail of these gents. We're liable to catch 'em with the goods. If so, we had ought to make our gather right then. Otherwise they'll probably hive off to parts unknown. We're not enough to handle this job, you an' me. I was figurin' on runnin' down two-three Mexicans maybe. Gitner's another proposition, an hombre of quite a different color. He packs his guns low an' comes a-foggin'."

"Someone has already mentioned that to me," the boy said quietly.

"Tell Miss Julia that we think Gitner is the man we're after."

Phil read his mind as though it had been a one-syllable primer. McCann believed that if he mentioned Gitner as the probable chief of the rustlers to Julia she would contrive some excuse to prevent her brother from returning with the posse.

"You can tell her that," Phil said. "I'm stayin' right here."

McCann rumpled his sunburnt hair and grinned. "You're some stubborn, if anyone asks me. Boy, why don't you act like you had horse sense?"

The upshot of it was that they both stayed. They decided to find out if they could where the outlaws were camped. Circumstances would have to decide whether they would attempt an arrest or go for help to round up the thieves.

They took a diagonal trail up the mountain side after they came to the end of Guadaloup canyon, for the hoofprints, sharp-edged and clean-cut, led that way.

It came on to rain, a gentle mist that blurred the hills. They put on their slickers and followed the dim trail until it lost itself in the rubble of a stony precipitous shoulder hunched up above a deep gulch.

As the rain increased the pines and the scrub oaks began to shower them with baths of moisture when they pushed too close. The tracks of the cattle were blotted out.

"Our luck's not standing up," Wilson said. "I wonder which way they drove those brush-splitters from here."

Phil cast back into his memory. "When I was a kid Dad brought us up here hunting. We stayed a week, the four of us. Nick Rafferty an' Jule were the other two. Our camp was in a wooded park back of a gulch you'd never know was there unless you stumbled on it. Just for fun Jule called it Horse Thief park, because it would be such a dandy place for rustlers to hole up. If I could find it. I recollect it's over to the southwest from this end of Guadaloup—six or seven miles maybe—or more, or less. They may not be camped there of course. But there was an old cabin some prospector had built, an' the grass was good. Plenty of water, too."

"Looks like a good bet. Whichever way we go it's a gamble. Might as well try yore Horse Thief park. It we could work around an' slip in the back way we could probably lie hid while we look around. How about that?"

The boy shook his head. "You can search me. We always went in by the gulch an' came out the same way. Point is, can I find the entrance to it?"

"Findin' our way in is one thing; getting' out is another," Wilson cautioned. "I'd hate to find Gitner had shoved a cork in the neck of the bottle while we were inside. I'm not lookin' for a showdown with the odds against us."

"I'm not crazy about bumpin' into him myself," Phil admitted.

Through the drizzle they plodded, moving toward the southwest. It was a land of innumerable hills, gulches, draws, wooded slopes and mountain passes. To find in this maze the concealed entrance to one small canyon was no easy task. For Phil could recall no details of the country's contour, nor any landmarks that reminded him of the way they had approached.

They wandered rather aimlessly for hours, trying first one defile and then another, riding up draws that proved to be blind alleys, and circling hills patiently. The night fell still wet. With difficulty they lit a fire. The sodden wood sputtered and smoked. From the pines above the gusts of wind shook showers of gathered moisture upon them.

Beneath the tarp that bound together the pack they slept uncomfortably. The ground was wet and cold, their blankets damp.

Daybreak found rain still falling from a sky banked with clouds. Breakfast was a cheerless business. To make matters worse, the pack horse had pulled its picket pin and wandered away.

"I've sure got the feel of the rocks in my bones," Phil grumbled with a rueful grin. "Looked to me like they would work right through to my spine. Say, what do we do about that fool hawss—start after it before breakfast?"

"I'll look around while you are fixin' up somethin' to eat. It wouldn't get far from the others."

Wilson picked up his rifle and walked out of the draw. He could see where the picket pin had been dragged through the wet grass as the horse had grazed down the slope. The trail led him over a little rise and sharply to the left, skirting a clump of willows on the shoulder of the hill.

Abruptly Wilson stopped. The pack horse was not a hundred yards in front of him, grazing contentedly on the moist grass in which it stood to the fetlocks. But after the first glance he forgot the horse. For he was looking at a small gateway between two rock faces, one rising directly in front of the other. Even from where he stood he could see that the opening between led into some sort of gulch.

He walked down to the mouth of the ravine and verified his first impression. Back of the first rock face was the mouth of a hidden canyon up which ran a well-defined path. By some odd freak of luck the pack horse had led him to Julia's Horse Thief park.

Wilson picked up one end of the picket rope and led the animal back to their camp. A smoky fire was struggling in a depressed fashion for its existence against the handicaps of sodden fuel and a steady rain.

"Better put out that fire, Phil, don't you reckon?" Wilson suggested. "Mr. Gitner or some of his friends might see it. That blamed lost gulch of yours is right round the corner."

Phil stared at him, saw he meant it, and began to throw dirt on the fire.

CHAPTER XIII

Booming Guns

Phil recognized the mouth of the gorge as soon as he saw it.

"Same place," he said. "I recollect that twisted pine there."

They returned to camp and packed. Wilson felt an extreme reluctance at letting the boy go with him farther, for he knew that he might be going into a trap from which escape would be very difficult. His remonstrance was useless, as he know it would be.

"I'm going through like I said I would," Phil told him stubbornly. "No use pow-wowing about it. What do you reckon I came along for, anyhow?"

They rode up the canyon in single file, Wilson leading the way. Both of them carried their rifles across the saddle in front, for neither doubted that they were going straight to the stronghold of the outlaws. It was possible they might at any bend of the trail meet face to face the men they were seeking.

"Glad it's rainin'," Wilson said, twisting for a moment in the saddle to speak back. "Unless they've got important business today they're liable to stay indoors an' loaf. That'll suit me fine."

"Here too," agreed Phil. He had a curious sinking sensation about the muscles of his stomach, but he had no intention whatever of turning back. It was the natural dread that comes to all men when they are moving for the first time into an unknown danger.

Out of the defile they emerged into a valley of mist that had no outline then.

"Cabin's over to the left," Phil whispered. "We better get in this pine grove up here right away. Sun'll be comin' out soon by the look of the clouds."

They deflected, climbing to the wooded slope to the right. From a break in the clouds the sun peeped out, at first timidly, then with more persistence. Slowly the mist settled, till the upper walls of the valley showed. The rock face opposite was painted yellow and green and ochre by the sunshine. It was half an hour before the fog was reduced to filmy shreds and a lake of mist nestling in a far corner of the valley.

From all directions sheer precipices rose. Technically the pasture ground inclosed was not a park but rather a depression driven down by some freakish trick of nature. It was as though some Titanic god in the morning of the world had stamped a gigantic foot on the soft plastic mountain mass and driven down with terrific force the crust of the earth.

The cabin lay across from them on the other slope of the saucer-shaped valley inclosed by the cliffs. A man came out from it in his shirt sleeves and stretched arms in a wide gesture that was evidently a yawn. Wilson adjusted his glasses and looked. Presently he handed the binocular to his companion.

"Gitner," said Phil after a moment.

"What we've got to find out now is whether those cattle down there are rustled," Wilson said, pointing to a small herd grazing on the slope opposite. "I'm going to look into that and make sure if I can."

"How?"

"Going to circle the valley close to the walls, hide in that fringe of bushes over there, an' drop down about dusk to the cattle for a look-see. You'd better stay here with the horses."

"Hadn't you better let me go?"

"No sir, I hadn't. We've got to settle one point now, Phil. Whatever happens we can't afford for both of us to be trapped. If you're seen here, make a break on yore cavallo down the canyon an' keep goin' till you can get help an' come back with a posse. I'll stay hid an' look out for myself. If I'm the one that's seen an' you hear firin', light out just the same."

"I'd be liable to do that," Phil said hotly. "We're in this together, ain't we? I'd cut acrost the valley to you lickety-split—"

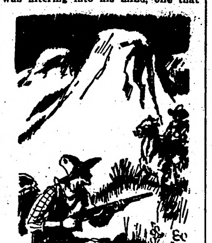
"Then you'd spoil my chance an' they'd get us both sure. It's a cinch Gitner has four or five fellers with him, all gunmen. I hate to quit without knowin' what brands are on that bunch of vacas, but I'll have to give up the idea if you won't be reasonable. I'm kinda particular about who gets my hide to hang up an' dry."

"Looky here," protested Phil. "I'm no kid, an' I never was teacher's pet. I figure myself a full-grown white man, if you want to know. You can get it right outa yore haid that I won't go through to a fare-you-well. We started on this job together an' it'll be even-steven with us. Why should I stick around here where I can make a get-away down the canyon while you go across there where you're liable to be bumped off?"

"Would there be any sense in both of us leavin' the horses and goin'?"

"Maybe not. Point is, I claim I'm the one had ought to go."

They had come to an impasse. Wilson was silent for a moment. A plan was filtering into his mind, one that would eliminate the boy from the risk of going down into the valley and yet would satisfy his pride.



He Looked Down, With Fear-Filled Eyes, at His Enemy.

"We'll draw lots for it," he suggested.

"Now you're shoutin'."

"First off, let's decide on one thing, Phil. Whoever goes has got to play a lone hand. If he's seen why he's outa luck. The other fellow has got to start for help right then. No fool boy business of ridin' over and mixin' up in the trouble. That wouldn't get either of us anywhere."

"Could one of us hold out alone till the other got back with help?"

"If he could reach the brush. He might get a good place to stand 'em off."

"Don't look to me like he'd have a dead man's chance," Phil said.

"Would it be any better if the other fellow came ridin' across an' got shot down before he ever reached him?"

"I reckon not—if he didn't reach him."

"And he wouldn't. No, Phil, I'll not go into this unless it's understood that the one who stays with the horses will burn the wind to get help."

"All right. I'll stand pat on that. Far as that goes we're not figurin' on gettin' caught."

"No. But you never can tell."

McCann stooped and showed between thumb and finger a pebble. He held his hands behind him for a moment, then offered for choice two closed brown fists.

"The pebble is in one. The fellow that draws it stays here, the other one goes."

Phil chose the right hand. When Wilson opened it a pebble lay in the palm. He flicked it away.

"I stay," Phil said.

"I'll look my guns over while you fix me up some grub to take. Probably I won't get back till some time in the night," Wilson said.

Phil turned toward the pack horse.

From McCann's left hand another pebble dropped. It was the same size and shape as the first.

Through the pines Wilson worked back to the foot of the cliff. In forgotten ages boulders had crumbled down from above and among them was a growth of soapweed, scrub oak, and manzanita. This offered cover while he circled the park to reach the opposite side of the valley. It was at least cover of a sort. There were open stretches to be passed where he stood out on the landscape, an obvious alien and intruder. He could only hope that no casual glance wandering over the park might become riveted on him and harden to cold and wary intentness.

It was easy for him now to doubt whether the plan he had chosen was the wisest. Would it not have been better to have slipped out of the park with Phil and returned for a posse, taking it for granted that this was the rendezvous of the rustlers and these cattle stolen ones driven here by them? Certainly it would have been far safer. For at any moment he might be seen or Phil's presence discovered. But he was thorough by nature. He wanted to carry back with him definite proof that he had located the outlaws and not merely a party of prospectors. Gitner and Jasper Stark had given it out that they were working a claim in the hills, location unknown. It was possible, though not probable, that their story might be true. Wilson did not propose to risk being laughed at the rest of his life for crying "Wolf!" when there was no lobo in sight.

While he moved forward through the brush his worried thoughts went back to the young fellow he had left with the horses. He wished now that he had flatly refused to come with Phil on this scouting expedition. If anything happened to the boy he could not forgive himself. This brother was all that Julia had left. If she should lose him, as she had lost her father—Jasper being far worse than dead—her life would be clouded with tragedy.

She had put Phil in his charge, and he had pledged himself to look after the lad. Was he doing it now, leaving him alone there among the pines across from the cabin, where at any moment the barking of a dog might betray him? He could say, of course with truth, that he had himself chosen to take the greater risk, since Phil if discovered had a way of escape open while he would have none. But there was always the possibility that Phil might be killed and that he might survive. In that case, how could he ever look into Julia's accusing eyes? He was nothing to her, of course. He never would be. But she was the center of all his cherished dreams.

He tried to find comfort in the reflection that if Phil were discovered and captured Jasper would never let his companions do the boy any harm. That Jasper was a scoundrel he knew, that he was a villain he suspected. It was Wilson's conviction that he had incited Gitner to kill his own father to protect himself from being cut out of Matthew Stark's will. But vile though he was, the man would never stand by and let his young brother be murdered if he could help it.

All his senses were alert as he crept forward, keeping close to the sheer rock walls that shut in the sunken valley. He made use of every bush, every depression, every hillock, that might serve as a screen. But his underlying thoughts clung to the perplexity which somehow had come to involve his life. A few months ago he had been free. Now he was fettered fast by inhibitions. For instance, if he should meet Jasper now face to face! What would he do? What could he do? He was Julia's brother.

The man was an insolvable problem to him. More than once he had seen cowboys "go bad," as the phrase of the country was. He had known killers, men of the Gitner type, with cold cruel eyes that held no mercy and into which one would look in vain for any faith or loyalty. But Jasper was different. He had come of good stock, had been given advantages which he had deliberately thrown away. His type was that which is both weak and vicious, which chooses by some perverted instinct the bad instead of the good. Led astray by greed and vanity, he could plot some horribly evil thing and afterward probably be tortured by the memory of it. It took strength to be bad in the thoroughgoing fashion of Gitner. The devil that lurked in Jasper's heart was an erratic and impulsive one, a shivering cowardly demon afraid of its shadow. How could such a man possibly be the son of game grim Matt Stark, the brother of so decent a boy as Phil, of so sweet and gallant a desert flower as Julia?

The afternoon was half spent before he reached a clump of manzanita back of the grazing cattle. Here he lay quietly, waiting until dusk should fall over the valley and lessen the risk of being seen when he moved out into the open pasture.

His mind was not easy. He could not get Phil out of his thoughts. Was the boy still concealed in the pines safe from observation? He had heard no shots, but his anxiety was keen. If it would have done any good he would have given up his purpose and hurried back to his companion. But to do so might be increasing the risk, since he would run a chance of being seen himself.

"Soon now," he told himself as the sun dropped back of the cliff behind him. "Half an hour an' I'll be moving."

The shadows crept up the face of the wall opposite, leaving only the upper half a canvas of yellows and ochres and copper greens. The ribbon of sunshine narrowed, at last disappeared.

Through the long grass Wilson crept, pushing his rifle in front of him. The nearest cattle were grazing head on toward him, so that he did not get a chance to see the brands well. All afternoon they had been out of sight behind a clump of alders, making it impossible for him to use the field glasses on them.

He circled round to see the brands, taking a wide detour. Presently, with the glasses, he was able to make out the markings of the cattle. He read the Flying VY brand and the Circle Cross. That was all he wanted to know. Cautiously he began to retreat toward the cliff.

The sound of a galloping horse stopped him. Someone was swinging around the cattle to drive them to the other end of the valley, probably to take the stock to water.

Wilson crouched low, but he knew he would be seen. For he was in the path of the approaching rider. His heart dropped into his stomach.

Not twenty yards from him the horseman pulled up with a startled oath. The man was Jasper Stark. He looked down, with fear-filled eyes, at his enemy. McCann was kneeling on one knee, rifle ready for action.

It could not have been more than a fraction of a second that Jasper stared at this unexpected and menacing intruder. Before the other could speak he gave a yell of terror, swung his horse in its tracks, and drove home the spurs.

Mechanically Wilson raised his weapon and covered the flying man. He drew a dead bead on him—then lowered the weapon. Swiftly his thoughts canvassed the situation. Deliberately he pointed the barrel of the rifle into the air and fired four shots.

This done, he ran back quickly to the cover of the manzanita, passed rapidly through it, and headed for a mass of rugged boulders at the upper end of the park. Here he could make a stand with some chance of success.

Several times his anxious eyes traveled toward the grove of pines where Phil was waiting. Already the mist of darkness was falling like a cloak from the darkening sky. He could barely make out the pines and he knew it would be impossible to detect any sign of life among them. Had Phil reached the entrance to the canyon? The rustlers would of course promptly close it, but if he had moved instantly at the signal he ought to have got there first, for they would wait to hear from Jasper the cause of the shots. No doubt they would be greatly disturbed at what he had to tell them. They would hurriedly debate the situation, would decide that McCann could not be alone, and might perhaps in their dread be driven to flight.

Wilson's fears were all for Phil. Later he might himself have to face the outlaws, but his immediate concern was for the boy. Had he escaped? Was he now golloping down the canyon, at every stride of the horse increasing the distance between him and danger?

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Famous Eulogy Said to Have Been Spontaneous

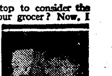
The case in which Senator Vest delivered his eulogy on the dog occurred shortly after the Civil war. Charles Burden of Kingsville, Mo., owned a hunting dog called Old Drum, of which he was very fond. His neighbor, Leonidas Hornsby, had lost a number of sheep which had been killed by dogs during the summer and fall of 1869. He threatened to kill the first dog who was found on his place. One day he had been hunting with Dick Ferguson and after they returned home a dog was heard outside. Hornsby told Ferguson to shoot. The next morning Old Drum was found dead and Burden decided to make Hornsby suffer. He, therefore, sued him for $50 damages. The first jury disagreed. The second jury gave him $25 damages. He appealed the case. According to Vest's family, he was asked by Burden to assist his lawyers at the trial for a stipulated sum of $10. He took no part in the trial until the closing appeal to the jury, when, without either notice or preparation, he made the well-known appeal. Tears were in the eyes of many members of the jury and a verdict of $500 damages was allowed, but the court stated that this amount was in excess of the petition and could not be allowed.

Felony Penalty

While conviction for a felony does not carry forfeiture of American citizenship, there are some states in which a convicted felon forfeits certain rights, such as the right to vote, unless he is pardoned.

"Missouri Compromise"

It is quite true that Henry Clay was not the author of a first Missouri compromise, passed in 1820, although he is given credit for a suggestion which was utilized by the senate in a bill to admit Maine as a free state and Missouri as a slave state. As a result of this controversy a joint committee was appointed which agreed to admit Maine and Missouri separately, leaving tthe Thomas amendment to the Missouri bill, which prohibited slavery in all the remainder of the Louisiana territory north of 36 degrees and 30 minutes north latitude (the southern boundary of Missouri).—Washington Star.



Jed Hopkins says—

PIN YOUR FAITH TO THE MAN BEHIND THE GROCERY COUNTER

You Owe Him A Debt Money Can Never Repay

Jed Hopkins, The Philosopher Who Never Went To College

SAY, didja ever stop to consider the debt you owe your grocer? Now, I don't mean money. Becuz lots of us has that worry now. But something more'n dollars and cents—yore health.

Well, sir I never did neither until the other day when I wuz down to Henry Miller's Grocery Store. We wuz just a chinnin' about things when along comes a drummer with lottsa gold in his teeth and all togged out like a $500 millionaire.

Well, Henry and me both spotted him for a slicker, alright. But Henry says:

"Howdy do," jest as perlite as if he wuz meetin' the preacher of his own church.

Well sir, I guess this travellin' man muster figgered he'd found an easy mark in Henry alright.

Becuz he started a talkin' big and fast and kept jabbin' Henry with his finger to kinder emphasize what he wuz sayin'. But Henry, he kept cool and didn' say much.

Then this drummer pulls out some bottles what was marked "Maple Syrup" and stood 'em on the counter and invites Henry to admit they was awful beautiful. And Henry admits they was beautiful.

Then th' drummer leans over to Henry and whispers in his ear not wantin' me to hear anything. And then Henry looks th' feller in th' eye and says, "Now you say this is genuwine 'Maple Syrup', made from th' sap of th' maple tree and it costs 10 cents less a bottle than the kind I got which is made by a pretty respect'ble company doing bizness all over the United States." Well, Henry keeps right on in that calm way he has, "Can you give me a guarantee to that effect?" And—then th' fun began.

Well sir, that drummer give a kinda nasty laugh and says maybe the syrup wasn't 100% pure but who'd know the difference. And, anyway, Henry could make more money selling his kind becuz folks trusted Henry's judgment and they'd never know they wasn't gettin' 100% pure maple syrup to put on their hot cakes mornin's.

Well, sir, knowin' the kinda man Henry is, I expected ter see that drummer go asailin' through the door. But I didn't know Henry well enough. Fer he never raises either his foot nor his tongue. But he just keeps on his quiet way an' says, "Now, Mister Salesman, I'd sure appreciate your packin' up yer bottles an' gettin' outa my store. But," says Henry in a tone like the crack of a blacksnake whip, "before you go, lemme tell you why I wouldn't buy your imitation maple syrup even if you wuz to give it to me free. Becuz—folks around here has got faith in me. An' they know when I sell 'em maple syrup—why she's 100% pure maple syrup. An' I'd rather have folks have faith in me than make a few dollars breaking faith with them aroun' here."

An' then Henry turns around and helps the feller put his bottles back in th' bag. An' away the drummer went lookin' fer all the world like a balloon what a kid just stuck a pin in at the County Fair.

But that's Henry fer ya, folks. And it's a mighty good thing. Becuz somebody's got to look after us considerin' all the stuff we lams inter our stomicks and never asks questions about.

So, seein' as how it's a poor rule that don't work both ways—maybe it'd be a good idear to kinda show a little more appreciation in your dealin's with your grocer.

Lost 20 Lbs. of Fat In Just 4 Weeks

Mrs. Mae West of St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I'm only 28 yrs. old and weighed 170 lbs. until taking one box of your Kruschen Salts just 4 weeks ago. I now weigh 150 lbs. I also have more energy and furthermore I've never had a hungry moment."

Fat folks should take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast—it's the SAFE, harmless way to reduce as tens of thousands of men and women know.

For your health's sake ask for and get Kruschen at any drug store—the cost for a bottle that lasts 4 weeks is but a trifle and if after the first bottle you are not joyfully satisfied with results—money back.

TALES OF THE CHIEFS

By Editha L. Watson

DEKANAWIDA AND HIAWATHA

Creeping out to a hole in the river ice, the Huron woman thrust her newborn baby into the freezing waters. There was a fear born of supernatural things in her heart, for it had been revealed to her that her son would be a source of evil to her people. Hence, it was loyalty to her tribe, and not hatred of her baby, that prompted the awful deed.

Morning came. The mother felt something warm in her arms. Curiosity triumphed over fear, and she dared to look at the little bundle—it was her child!

Twice more, she tried to drown her ill-omened son in the icy waters of the river, and twice more he miraculously reappeared in her arms at dawn. She could no longer bear to attempt his death.

This is a legend, it is true, but the child, who grew into one of the greatest of Indian statesmen, is a historical reality. His name was Dekanawida, and it was he who, with one other, formed the first successful league of nations, and propounded the idea of universal peace.

The Hurons had united four tribes about the year 1500, but this league did not last. Since it was the Iroquois confederation which destroyed that of the Hurons, the prophecy about Dekanawida would seem to have come to pass. It is probable, however, that the young Indian had an unusually alert mind, which grasped the shortcomings of the Huron union and later turned them to account in the organization of the Iroquois confederacy.

As soon as he had grown to manhood, Dekanawida traveled south. He was equipped with two mighty essentials for his life-work—wisdom in framing laws and establishing the foundation upon which the confederation was based, and astuteness in negotiation.

Among the Mohawk, about the same time, a younger man, who was called Hiawatha, was filled with the same ideas. Legends have grown up around him, too, and in fact we think of Hiawatha as the hero of Longfellow's poem, but the truth is that the poem was written about Manabozho, a Chippewa deity, and does not contain a single fact or fiction relating to the real Hiawatha.

Somehow the two Indians met, and found powerful allies in each other. It was Dekanawida who formulated the laws and principles of the confederation. It was Hiawatha who converted the five tribes to the idea of union. Together they labored to establish reforms which would end all strife and murder.

As modern reformers can testify, this was a bitterly hard task, and the two were opposed, not by the general public so much as by men of equal standing with their own. One of these, an Onondaga, among which tribe Hiawatha started his campaign, went so far as to kill Hiawatha's daughters in his efforts to halt him. Even this crime, however, proved unsuccessful in its purpose.

Hiawatha made three attempts to bring his scheme before the Onondaga council, but the crafty chief thwarted him each time. He then turned to his own people, the Mohawks, for aid. It is well known what honor a prophet has in his own country, so that we are not surprised to learn that his efforts met with meager success. Then he went to the Oneida, and at last obtained their promise to join the projected confederacy if the Mohawk would do likewise. Armed with this agreement, he returned to the Mohawks, and finally was able to persuade them to unite with the Oneida and the Cayuga, and to invite the Onondaga to join them. This tribe at last promised to join if another, the Seneca, would also enter the confederacy. Such promises would have discouraged a less earnest man. Hiawatha, however, considered them in the light of a partial success, and, emboldened by it, he redoubled his efforts to consolidate the temporizing nations.

At last, about 1570, the five tribes were brought into confederation, and united in adopting the laws framed by Dekanawida for the common welfare. It is worthy of note that the remorseless Onondaga chief who had so opposed Hiawatha's efforts in the beginning, was the one through whom that tribe accepted the proposed union. As the chief was a reputed sorcerer, this victory of Dekanawida and Hiawatha over him was looked upon by the Indians as a sign of great supernatural power, a fact which added greatly to their prestige, now that it was too late to be of much value.

The Iroquois confederation was not the first league of nations, as the Hurons had united four tribes about thirty years earlier, but it was the first successful one. The sensible laws and stable foundation given it by the able brain of Dekanawida, and the untiring efforts of both Dekanawida and Hiawatha, formed a project deemed worthy of study by our statesmen of modern times.

There are no statues erected to the memory of these two gifted men. They are scarcely known except by delvers in Indian lore. But the Iroquois confederation stands in history as their monument, and the memory of their success will encourage the peace-proponents of our day.

JUSTICE

A good old Quaker was milking a cow whose lively disposition had often taxed his patience severely. The pail was nearly full of foaming milk, when, in some manner, the cow managed to overturn it. The old man in righteous indignation snatched up a nearby club to strike the exasperating animal when he remembered the precepts of his religion.

He dropped the stick, and in a voice trembling with anger said: "I may not beat thee, neither may I kick thee, but—I will twist thy durn tail."—Prairie Farmer.

Gran Chaco Known as Land of Death

Where Bolivia, Paraguay and Argentina join on the map of South America lies the Gran Chaco, a steaming, insect-swarming triangle 600 miles by 300 between the Paraguay and Pilcomayo rivers.

Julian Duguid, British explorer, has described the Pilcomayo as "a vast, foul-smelling, oozy stretch of bog with as much movement as an unsqueezed sponge. . . . An Englishman may obtain some insight into the discomfort of penetration into the Chaco if he locks himself into a hothouse, waters the flowers, closes all the windows, and allows a blazing sun to shine through the glass while he rides a stationary bicycle. Even then he will not be bothered by insects."

The worst insects are ihenni, vicious black flies that hang in dark clouds in the air. There are also poisonous snakes, jaguars and piranhas (carnivorous fish). Despite the dampness, water holes are 15 to 40 miles apart.

This is the land over which Bolivia and Paraguay have squabbled since 1879. Paraguay wants the Chaco because the district is larger than the rest of their country and its jungles contain great growths of the quebracho tree, whose bark yields 30 per cent tannin.—Time Magazine.

WARNING

to PROPERTY OWNERS

TODAY a letter came to my desk that deeply impressed me. It was written by a woman—the mother in a typical American family. Her little home had been saved from foreclosure by a coat of new paint, for which a part of their meager savings had been paid.

Those few gallons of fresh paint had so revived the appearance and enhanced the value of the property that the mortgagee had consented to renew the loan . . . and the little home was saved.

I could not help thinking of the thousands of homes and buildings that are shabby and unattractive today due to several years of neglected painting; of the millions of home owners who, because of reduced incomes and enforced economy, have been obliged to sacrifice painting for taxes, interest, assessments, to say nothing of food, clothing, heat and other essentials of comfort and health.

You have seen these paint-starved houses and buildings, as have I. They are everywhere about you. Perhaps your home is included.

Do you understand what they signify? Do you realize what will happen to wood or metal that is literally naked of paint if these houses and buildings face the attack of another season of rain, snow, ice, and frost?

Never in the history of our country has the situation been paralleled. Property owners face an added burden of expense amounting to millions of dollars for repairs and replacements next spring.

And the crisis, in my opinion, will be reached this coming winter when paint of four, five, and even six years exposure to the weather will be unable to resist the elements—when badly weathered wood and metal will be easy prey for rot, rust and decay.

Today the big question facing thousands of property owners is plain. It is "paint or pay." Either you must invest a little this fall in new paint or you must take the risk of paying many times the cost of paint to repair the damage done by rot, rust and decay this winter.

Even at the sacrifice of other things, have your house or buildings completely repainted now. No investment you can make will pay better dividends. And nothing you can buy will make you and your family feel so uplifted and cheerful.

If you cannot arrange to do a complete repainting job now, at least give the badly weathered places a coat or two of protecting paint.

Look especially, to the window sills, thresholds, outdoor porches and steps; the joints of porch railings and palings; the bases of pillars; the edges of eaves; the roof; the gutters and down spouts. These are the vital spots where water lodges—where ice and frost settle—where rot and rust attack first.

A few dollars' worth of good paint, applied now, will protect these vital spots—will tide you over this crucial winter. And it will probably save you a much greater expense for repairs and replacements next spring and summer.

Under existing conditions, you may be tempted to buy a cheap paint because of its low price. I hope you will not make this costly mistake.

Even on sound lumber, inferior paint is a poor bargain. But on weathered wood, which is very porous, such paint is worse than useless. It gives you a false feeling of security and leaves you without protection.

Prices of well-known, established brands of paint are now the lowest in fifteen years. Enough good, dependable paint can be purchased for a few dollars to protect all the badly weathered surfaces on your building.

Again I repeat, do a complete job this fall if you can. But at least do the vital exposed places before it is "too late."

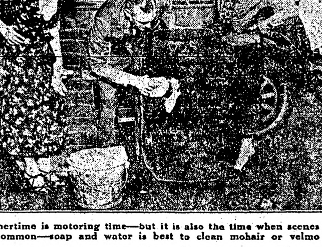
Soap and Water Best Mohair Cleaner



Summertime is motoring time—but it is also the time when scenes like this are common—soap and water is best to clean mohair or velmo upholstery.

MOHAIR POPULAR FOR AUTO SEATS

Easy to Clean—It Makes Expensive Slip Covers Unnecessary.

An increasing preference for mohair velvet upholstery in automobiles is being manifested by buyers throughout the Middle West, according to reports to the Mohair Institute from a questionnaire sent to 5,000 dealers. While the survey did not seek the detailed reasons for this preference, one of the chief reasons, previous surveys has shown, is that mohair is preferred in the summer because it is cooler than flat fabrics, it is easier to keep clean and the buyer does not need to go to the extra expense of purchasing slipcovers. No slip covers are necessary with mohair velvet or velmo.

The Mohair Institute is authority for many practical hints for taking care of mohair velvet upholstery in case it becomes soiled. The fabric requires comparatively little attention aside from a thorough brushing with a stiff whisk broom occasionally.

Ordinary grease spots and soiling from constant use can be removed from mohair velvet with warm water and any good laundry or toilet soap. If this operation is not sufficient, any of the reputable dry cleaning compounds are practical for the purpose, but under no circumstances should any ammonia solutions be used, as ammonia is destructive to the color in any fabric.

Ink spots may be removed with a saturated solution of oxalic acid. Soak the stain for a few seconds with this solution, then rinse in clear water to which a few drops of ammonia have been added. Perhaps a better method, eliminating the use of ammonia, is a solution of potassium acid oxalic which is salts of lemon or salts of sorrell.

Soak the stain in this solution in the proportion of two and one-half teaspoonful of the salts dissolved in one-half pint of water, leaving the fabric in the solution several hours if necessary, after which apply soapsuds on the spot, allowing the suds to soak well into the fiber, then rinse with cold water. This will neutralize any of the acid which may be left in the goods.

Sometimes after severe use, mohair upholstery takes a kind of set in spots, the pile being laid slightly, giving the goods a mottled color effect. This can be removed by wringing out a cloth in hot water and laying it over the parts affected. Leave the wet cloth on the mohair velvet until the cloth dries. If the velvet has not been wholly restored, repeat the operation with the result that the pile which is laid down will come back to its original position and the fabric will have its original plump appearance, not showing any signs of wear. It is never necessary to cover any mohair velvet upholstery with slip covers, particularly when used at home or in an automobile.

NATION'S FINANCE STANDS TEST WELL

Economic Policy Commission of Bankers Association Points Out How 22,000 Banks Protect Public Interest

OVER 22,000 banks all over the United States are "quietly and efficiently serving their communities, helping tide many business enterprises over their difficulties, helping many concerns to earn money, helping create the economic activities that mean payrolls and spending power in their zones of influence, and faithfully keeping guard over the working capital and savings funds of their depositors," the Economic Policy Commission of the American Bankers Association says in a recent survey, adding:

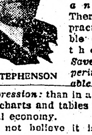
"It surely stands strikingly to the credit of the banking profession that, during a period of unparalleled international economic depression, this vast majority of bankers have so competently, so courageously and so successfully met their difficulties and obligations. The effects of the drought, the demoralization of agriculture, the stagnation of industry, the breakdown of trade, the inability of so many heretofore desirable customers to meet their obligations to the banks, the impairment of public confidence by mob-scares and false rumors resulting in unreasoning runs, the abnormal depreciation of quoted security values even in the most wisely conceived investment accounts, the utter collapse of real estate values—all these things have occurred on a nationwide and worldwide scale with unprecedented severity.

"The effects of every one of them have assailed the banks with destructive forces because they are of the very essence of a bank's economic substance. Yet, as we have shown, the great bulk of our banking deposits has been protected without harm, and our banks in a vast majority have continued to serve, support and strengthen their customers and their communities with unflagging and unconquered devotion."

WOULD ALTER OUR FINANCIAL HABITS

By ROME C. STEPHENSON

Former President American Bankers Association



R. C. STEPHENSON

THE most constructive action that can be taken toward bringing about greater stability in our business life is the development of a more balanced attitude in the minds of all of our people in regard to the right relationship between saving and spending. There is more practical, workable economics in the sentence: Save during prosperity so as to be able to spend during depression: than in a whole library full of charts and tables and books on political economy.

I do not believe it is an impracticable dream to bring about an era of more intelligent saving and spending on the part of our people. It is not impossible to change the habits of the population. It has been done in many lines. The habits of our people have been improved and the health of the nation promoted in many ways by consistent programs of advertising and education that have brought about better hygienic understanding and practices.

The medical profession has virtually banished the scourge of some diseases by persistent, intelligent campaigns of preventive sanitary measures and inoculations, requiring new understandings, new habits among many millions of our people. Also a large part of this evolution of public health improvement has naturally developed through the intelligent advertising of many products that have to do with bodily care. I refer to the manufacturers and distributers of such things as more healthful shoes, more effective toothbrushes, food products with more wholesome values of nutrition and countless other practical ideas that have become commonplaces of our daily business life,—and that have become a part, too, of the very texture of the personal habits and health of great masses of our people.

If it has been good advertising and good business for so many of our national producers to spend millions of dollars thus to inculcate new habits of personal hygiene and personal care, is it not good business and good advertising for our banking interests to lay similar stress during the next period of prosperity upon better financial habits and customs of our people?

Bankers above all are interested in stable, wholesome business. They have much to gain by a state of sound financial health among the people, and most to lose by epidemics of economic maladies such as have swept the country during the past two years.

The man who has in better times been favored with too much credit rather than not enough is finding it hard to pay his interest now with low prices for his products or labor.

Thief Lake Closed for 1932

The closing of Thief Lake to shooting this fall through an executive order will be heralded by real sportsmen and conservationists of the state as a forward stride in conservation. The order was signed by Governor Olson last Friday, according to an announcement made by the Division of Game and Fish of the Department of Conservation, and is effective this year only.

The executive order was only issued by the Governor after he had made a thorough personal investigation at Thief Lake, as to the number of ducks, coots, and geese, the number bred at the lake and the course of flight. It will prove encouraging to duck hunters to learn, however, that there will be ample opportunity for shooting in territory adjoining Thief Lake.

Last fall the Game and Fish Division trapped some 450 mallard ducks that were wintered at the state game farm at Madelia. These birds were released this spring at Thief Lake, after their wings had been clipped. They acted as decoys for birds flying north and as a result, literally thousands of ducks bred and fed at the lake this summer.

They are so tame that a boat can approach within a few feet of them. No shooting sport would result. If the ducks are not disturbed this fall, they will return in increased numbers this coming spring. The flight trend over the lake also can be better noted so that guess-work will be eliminated in setting aside the one-third area for a game and wild life refuge, the remaining two-thirds to be public shooting grounds.

Julius Faiman, old pioneer of southeast of town, died at a hospital at Fergus Falls on Friday morning. The remains were shipped up here for buriel.

Mr. Faiman had been blind for many years.

The little daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Ness, who had been ill for some time, died Sunday morning.

The News extends the deepest sympathy to the bereaved in their hour of sorrow.

Return from Philadelphia

Rev. and Mrs. L. M. Redal and family, and Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Hanson returned Wednesday from Philadelphia, where they went about two weeks ago to attend the wedding of one of Rev. Redal's sisters, and to visit at the home of his father, Rev. J. L. Redal.

They spent some time sightseeing along the way. The return trip took them four days.

Something About the Extraction of Honey

Frank Schulz of Warren gave this office a pleasant call yesterday and told us something of the extracting of honey. In packing his honey, says Mr. Schulz, he uses only the best part of the combs. He never uses the brood chamber, where the queen bee lays her eggs and the young are hatched. However, he sells brood chamber honey at a greatly reduced price, for stock feed. It generally has a stronger taste than good table honey, and is yellowish to brown in color.

Claim to Superiority

The Nordic theory is that the white race is biologically superior to all others and that a certain division of the white race, the Nordic, is the most nearly perfect of all.

Ancient Copper Mines

The copper mines of Spain were worked by the Phoenicians as early as 1240 B. C., and are still productive. It was in these ancient mines that our modern methods of mining metals were first developed.

Reminder of Dark Age

Witch-burning days in Scotland were recalled when a human skull was found during excavations at the Bogle hole, Mullesburgh. The Bogle hole was one of the places in Scotland where witches were burned after trial. It was known in 1561 as the Terror's Croft. The last recorded trial of persons accused of witchcraft was held in Musselburgh on July 29, 1661.

Mrs. Gavere, who has been ill for some time, was taken to a hospital in Minneapolis on Tuesday. A. L. Carlson and Arvid Carlson took her down in their new ambulance.

Deer and Partridge Hunting

Open season on deer has been recommended by the state conservation commission in eighteen northern Minnesota counties from November 15 to 25 inclusive. The governor will have to approve the recommendation before it becomes effective.

The eighteen counties included in the recommendation are St. Louis, Cook, Lake, Carlton, Pine, Beltrami, Koochiching, Cass, Roseau, Lake of the Woods, Clearwater, Hubbard, Aitkin, Itasca, Mahnomen, Crow Wing, the east half of Marshall, and Becker, except for three townships in the southeast corner.

A short season permitting hunting of partridges will be open on October 15 and close October 19. The game limit is four a day with a possession limit of eight.

In the northern section the partridges this season may be taken in Itasca, Koochiching, St. Louis, Lake, Cook, Aitkin, Carlton, Pine, Kanabec, Mille Lacs, Crow Wing, Cass, Hubbard, Beltrami, Lake of the Woods, and Roseau.

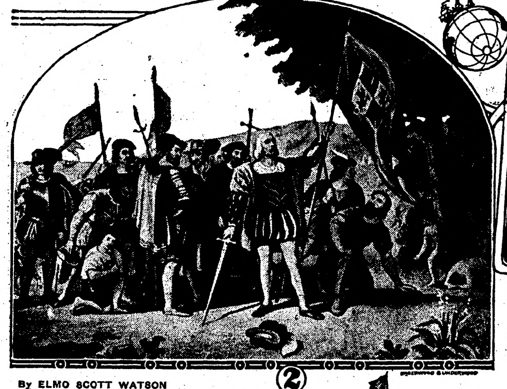
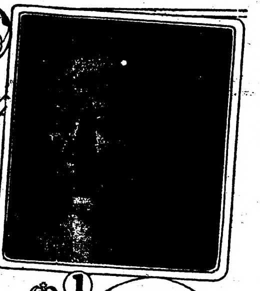
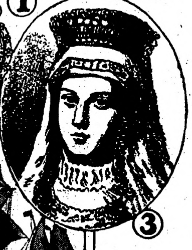
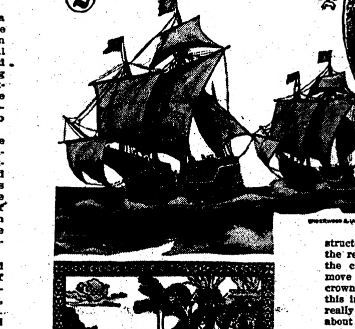
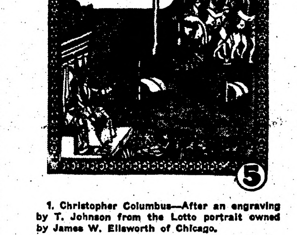
Columbus Day 1932











By ELMO SCOTT WATSON

COLUMBUS DAY this year finds a long-discussed memorial to the great navigator nearer reality than ever before, for an international jury of architects has announced its selection of the prize-winning design for the monumental lighthouse which is to stand facing the harbor of the City of Santo Domingo in the Republic of Santo Domingo in the West Indies.

The prize-winning design, a lighthouse in the form of a cross, is the work of an English architect, twenty-four-year-old J. L. Greave of Nottingham, and when the lighthouse is completed it will be unique among memorial structures throughout the world. And certainly it will be the kind of memorial which Columbus himself would have most desired—this great beacon which shall safely guide the sailors of both the sea and the air who follow him to his last resting place in Santo Domingo.

The prize design, according to Frank Lloyd Wright, the Chicago architect and a member of the international jury, not only reflects a monument of distinguished and impressive simplicity, but it presents a memorial form with a purpose. "Anything in the nature of a monument," said Mr. Wright, "is today somewhat old-fashioned in thought. This happens to be more a memorial than a monument in that it serves a useful purpose. Through its radiated lighting, the Columbus Cross will serve as both a good air beacon and a good lighthouse. As a navigators' and aviators' beacon it has, unlike many other monuments, some reason for existence. The historic spot chosen for the memorial on Santo Domingo harbor, not far from the ruins of what was once the palace of Columbus' brother, Bartholomew, is an appropriate site for this enduring symbol of friendship between North and South America."

From its harbor side the lighthouse will be reached by a flight of broad low steps. According to the design the main entrance carries into a building which, as described by Mr. Wright, becomes a series of high cool canyons, the walls bearing sculptured motifs. Standing in the center of the largest canyon are six small altars. From these altars light is radiated upward through clefts (in the mass of the structure) in the pattern of a cross. It is this lighting system that forms the air beacon. The revolving navigators' beacon (a horizontal beam) will be mounted at the center and highest part of the cross. In its memorial chapel there will be a tomb where the bones of Columbus, which some students believe to be in the Cathedral of Santo Domingo, will be laid.

While the harbor portal may be called the main entrance, there are two others almost as impressive. They also form part of the setback design of the pyramidal pattern. There is a fourth portal at the diminishing point of the cross, affording a view of Santo Domingo's aviation field. A visitor may enter at the harbor side, and after traversing the several canyons leave by a rear door. A terrace on top of the structure, also open to visitors, commands a fine view of the harbor and city. The altars, which stand free and clear down the center of the major canyon, will tell through bas-reliefs the story of Columbus and his journey of discovery to a strange land.

That there is no idea of height in the memorial structure, Mr. Wright considers an impressive feature of the design. "Here is something finer in the idea," said Mr. Wright, "something a little more natural, a little more organic, a little more a part of the historic plot it is to commemorate. The simple thing, when you want to mark a spot, is to drive in a post, and in the case of most present-day monuments and skyscrapers the higher the post the better. This memorial is more like making a symbol (in this instance a cross) on the ground and giving it architectural character that will endure for centuries. It is earthquake-proof. In time, the jungle may grow over it, it may disappear from sight, it may be rediscovered. But it will still be a worthy symbol suitably commemorating a great discovery."

More than $800,000 has already been contributed by this country for the monument, which will cost in the neighborhod of $1,500,000. Santo Domingo and several South American cities have appropriated several hundred thousand dollars for the project, which is in charge of a committee of the Pan American Union.

So after more than half a century of persevering effort, during which the idea of building a fitting memorial to the man who is universally hailed as the discoverer of America was kept alive by a few enthusiastic Latin-Americans, the dream is nearer reality than ever before in this four hundred and fortieth year since Columbus made his first epochal voyage.

The honor of first suggesting the erection of a great memorial lighthouse to the eternal glory of Columbus belongs to a son of Santo Domingo, whose people have for many generations, despite their small numbers and limited means, done so much to honor the name of the great navigator. Don Antonio de Monte y Tejada of Santo Domingo, the spot Columbus loved above all other lands be discovered, wrote in 1852:

"The time has arrived . . . when the verdict of posterity should be proclaimed. This verdict must be as noble, generous, memorable and eternal as his deeds. Let America proclaim it in unison, and let her acknowledge by all means that the honor of the discovery belongs to Columbus; that to him as the initiator of such great exploits are due the many discoveries that have been made by others to this day . . . and in order that this acknowledgment may be worthy of the New World, let us erect in the most visible and notable place in America, in a central point and where it may be visited by travelers as they approach her shores, the statue that his greatness and remembrance demand.

"I designate as such a place, Cape Isabella, on the Island of Hispaniola, because there the first city in America was founded, and let it be designed by the best sculptor and paid with funds raised by popular subscription in all the cities of Europe and America. In order that this symbol may carry within itself all the attributes of perpetuity, let there be established in this statue a lighthouse so travelers from the Old and New Worlds may look full of gratitude and emotion toward that venerable image, when they sight the first land from the sea."

Nearly 30 years after these stirring words were penned, another Dominican asked the nations of America to co-operate with ancient Hispaniola to the end that a fitting memorial be reared to Columbus on the spot where he first stepped ashore on American soil. This man was Gen Gregorio Luperon, Santo Domingo's greatest hero in her war against Spain in 1863-65.

Although many statues have been dedicated in different lands to the honor of Columbus—one of the most notable being erected in the Plaza of Santo Domingo City which has since been called the Plaza de Colon—and his ashes have been enshrined in the cathedral in the city of Santo Domingo, yet the idea of a monumental memorial conceived and built by all the people of America, would not die.

At the time (October 12, 1892—the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America) that the Santo Domingo government constructed the great monument that now holds the remains of the discoverer and placed it in the cathedral there, their hope was later to move this tomb to an appropriate structure, crowned by a lighthouse. Lack of funds made this impossible, and it was not until 1914 that really systematic labors were begun to bring about the building of the memorial lighthouse to be participated in by all America.

The leader in this work was William E. Pullian, an American, then receiver of Dominican customs, whose labors resulted in enlisting the interest of editors and publicists throughout North and South America. Mr. Pullian also was the first to appear before the house committee on foreign affairs, where he explained the projected memorial and urged the United States government to participate in the proposal to make this testimonial of gratitude of all the Americas to Columbus an assured fact.

But international support of the long-sought memorial failed to crystallize until 1923 when the fifth international conference of American states met at Santiago de Chile. Here a resolution, proposed by the Dominican delegate, Julio M. Cestero, and unanimously adopted, resolved, "To recommend that all the American republics unite to honor the memory of Christopher Columbus by the erection of a monumental lighthouse, which will bear his name on the coast of Santo Domingo, capital of the Dominican republic, and which shall be built with the co-operation of the governments and people of America and any others who may so desire."

On June 27, 1927, the congress of the United States ratified the action, resolving, "that the several states be notified of the desire of the people of the United States to participate in this movement to honor the memory of the great navigator and discoverer."

Meanwhile the governing committee of the Pan-American Union, having taken steps to secure Pan-American co-operation, resolved in April, 1927, "that the Columbus lighthouse be erected on the coast of Santo Domingo, since this site is the most appropriate one for rendering homage to the memory of the great navigator. This coast was the first land touched in the journey which discovered the continent; it was there that the vision of the New World, given to civilization by the genius of Columbus and the zeal of Spain, assumed reality; it was in Hispaniola that Columbus wishes his ashes to rest and there receive the veneration of America, and it is but just that the monument to his glory should be erected on the scene of his fortunes and misfortunes, near the site of the first colonial city and near the tomb where the piety of a nation has for centuries done reverence to his remains.

"And in order that the offering may be more nearly perfect and more genuinely expressive of the significance of the discovery, of the measure of progress and well being brought to humanity by the store of natural wealth on the continent discovered by Columbus, and of the contribution of culture brought to civilization by the intellectual labor of America, the committee believes it would be fitting for each American nation to send in addition to pecuniary contribution, a portion of earth from its soil to be deposited at the base of the monument and a product of its art or industry to be used in the building, thereby giving real symbolic significance of what is most fundamental and most sacred in the national existence of each country."

The unanimity of thought, labor and expense that animates all the 21 states of North, South and Central America in bringing about the design and construction of this great memorial is one more proof—and the greatest—that Columbus holds first place in the hearts of all men.

Of almost equal significance to the United States is the further concrete evidence that in building this memorial the Pan-American Union has actually become something more than a paper union held together by an imposing building in Washington. Further links in the ties which bind Pan-America may in consequence from this unity of effort be expected in the coming years and these links may well be of the greatest importance to the integrity of this nation.

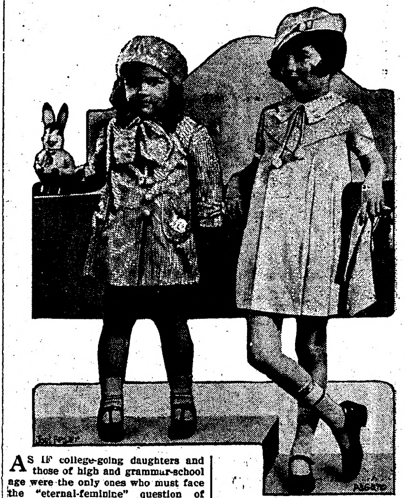
Clothes for the Kindergarten Age

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



AS IF college-going daughters and those of high and grammar-school age were the only ones who must face the "eternal-feminine" question of dress which the back-to-school season always brings on! What about the myriads of youngsters in kindergarten or in first-grade classes? Well, it's mother who must solve this problem.

To be "practical" in childhood's realm, clothes must yield kindly to frequent tubbings. From this point mothers are finding out that corduroy for tiny-tot coats and any one or more of the now-so-popular durene cotton meshes for wee folks' frocks serve a hundred per cent perfect.

Not only do the good looks and the washable qualities of corduroy speak in its favor but the fact that the modern weave is so much more supple than the old-style corduroy and lighter in weight, makes this material infinitely easier for the seamstress to handle. And so, mothers who know have come to consider corduroy a medium-ideal for the making of children's school and playtime apparel.

The corduroy coat-and hat "set" which little Miss Curlylocks is so proudly wearing in the picture might wisely be included in the wardrobe of any little girl who must go back and forth to kindergarten during crisp autumn days. Much to the delight of its wearer it has a cunning white bunny appliqued on each pocket. A self-scarf ties in cravat fashion close up around the throat in latest adult fashion. The neckline is, however, adjustable in that the coat can be thrown open, forming lapels at the front.

Mothers seeking materials for little girls' school dresses are making new discoveries in the realm of cotton fabrics which are proving genuinely helpful to them. They are finding smart durene cottons so artfully woven as to have an expensive woolly appearance whereas in reality they are unbelievedly low-priced. Diagonals, ribbed effects, basket weaves, herringbone stripes and all sorts of fascinating novelties are included, and in a range of delectable colors from pastel tints to the very latest autumn reds, greens, navies and browns.

The oldest child in the picture is gowned in an attractive dress made of durene cotton mesh. It features a yoke which buttons up the front so that it will slip on and off easily. There is also a matching bolero (in her hand). The ball and cord tie which is an effective trimming touch is easily made of yarn. The jaunty little durene mesh brimmed hat is an interpretation of a French juvenile fashion. The whole outfit washes beautifully—comes out looking like new from each tubbing.

A tiny-tot wardrobe would not be complete this season without at least one knitted costume. One can get such "cute" little sweater-and-skirt outfits and in charming color combinations. These make a great point of interesting stitch effects.

PREDICT VELVET WILL BE POPULAR

Velvet is verging on one of the biggest vogues it has ever enjoyed in the fashion world.

Until recently worn mainly by the mature or elderly woman, it has suddenly become one of the smartest fabrics of the day and French factories are now working day and night to supply the demand for coming fall and winter clothes.

There are many new varieties, the heavily woven velvet and the soft light ones, the chiffon-ring variety and velours mousseline, as well as an extremely fine and silky sort made at Lyons.

Dresses, coats, hats and even shoes are being made of velvet.

"Little Convict" Is New Hat Popular in London

A new hat is taking London by storm. It is less eccentric and "difficult" than the boater or pillbox, which had a brief but devastating popularity, and is called the "little convict." Like the beret, it is a type of skull-cap, but is more formal than that charming but abused piece of millinery.

It consists of three strips or triangles, sewed to fit closely to the head, but with a peak coming down on the forehead, taking off the bare look that the just-gone fashions have had, and is seen in almost every material.

It can be adorned very successfully with a feather or spray of flowers, or a jeweled clasp—which, by the way, doesn't really clasp anything—and just as successfully left quite plain.

Shirred Prints

Printed sheer costumes are shirred so that the print is most charmingly blurred. Sometimes the whole frock is shirred and the jacket is left unshirred—so that there is a pleasant contrast of design between the two.

Crochet Hats

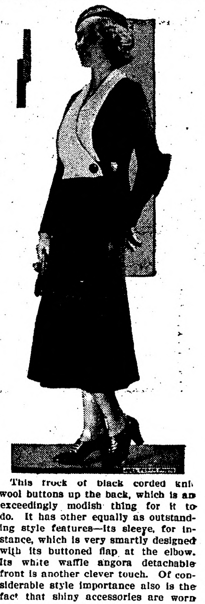
Brimmed hats of Irish and simple thread crochet mesh are replacing the brimless crochet caps that everyone was wearing earlier in the season.

Rough Cottons

Not only are these new tweedy looking cottons especially smart for suits and matching top coats but they make simply grand beach coats.

BUTTONS UP BACK

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



This frock of black corded knit wool buttons up the back, which is an exceedingly modish thing for it to do. It has other equally as outstanding style features—its sleeve, for instance, which is very smartly designed with its buttoned flap at the elbow. Its white waffle angora detachable front is another clever touch. Of considerable style importance also is the fact that shiny accessories are worn with this dull-finished knit outfit. The buttons, the belt and the shoes, all shine forth in effective contrast to the somber black. Patent leather belts with patent leather shoes are regarded as being in high style for fall. The shoes this young woman is wearing are side-laced patent leather and suede oxfords of the high-cut version.

As McCann reached the boulder field there came to him the faint far-away explosion of a gun. Another almost merged in the first, and a few seconds later came a third sound like the popping of a distant firecracker.

That was all. Carried on the evening breeze to one not keyed by apprehension, they might have seemed friendly greetings of the night. But to Wilson there was something in those sounds that shook his soul. They seemed to him sinister signals of tragedy. For he did not doubt that Phil had been challenged while escaping and that in the flash of guns which instantly followed somebody had been hurt.

He listened, nerves taut, heart drenched with dread, but no other shots came to break the stillness. The boy had either broken through or they had got him. Which?

He had intended to lie hidden in the boulder field till he was discovered and make there a stand against the rustlers. But he found it impossible to wait there quietly while in doubt about Phil's fate. Julia had put her brother in his care. Perhaps the youngster lay wounded somewhere on the trail. He must find out.

Only a few stars were yet out. In the darkness he strode across the park through the grass, headed for the pine hill where he had left Phil and the horses. He wanted to make sure that Phil had at least started for home.

In the hollow back of the pine-clad slope Wilson found the pack horse and his own mount Jim-Dandy. The latter was saddled and tied by a slip knot to a young tree.

He swung to his seat and rode down the hill. The entrance to the gulch was perhaps a hundred and fifty yards from the house. He was still some distance from it when a rider emerged, galloping hard, and made straight for the cabin.

Wilson pulled up. The man had come from the canyon bringing news with him. What was the important message that drove him so fast to his confederates? He would very much like to know. It might greatly simplify the problem before him.

"I reckon we'll not go right now, Jim-Dandy—not till I've had a look at the cabin, anyhow. There's just a chance they've got Phil there."

He left the cowpony in a draw and moved with a long even stride toward the house. His rifle he left beside the horse. It would only hamper him at close quarters. If it came to a gunplay his .45 would be better.

No dog came barking to sound warning of his approach. He came by the rear, to a curtained window of a lighted room.

Inside were four men—Gitner, Jasper Stark, Mark Dunwig, and Kelly Brown. All were on their feet, intent, and one at least frightened. From the edge of the curtain Wilson could see two-thirds of the room. To sweep with his gaze the rest of it he had to move to the other side of the window.

Brown stood just inside the doorway telling a story.

"An' when he wouldn't stop I let him have it." He made his narrative dramatic by an instinctive crouched gesture of throwing a gun on someone. "He blazed away at me as he went by. Before he turned the bend in the trail I fired again."

"Hit him?" demanded Gitner with an oath.

"Don't know. He sure kept travelin'. I followed a li'l ways, then lit out up here to tell you boys."

"Know him?" asked Dunwig.

Brown pointed to Stark. "His kid brother."

Jasper's high voice betrayed his fear. "They've got us trapped," he whined. "I told you I didn't want to throw in with you in this rotten game, Carl. By G—d, we've got a rope round our necks right now."

The Texan looked at him scornfully, his legs wide apart, cruel eyes narrowed. "You're one h—l of a pardner, Jas. No guts."

Dunwig spoke, his light blue eyes taking in Jasper with swift furtive appraisal. He was convinced that Stark would betray them to save his own hide if the chance came. "Don't look to me like we're trapped. Not by a jugful. What's yore brother breakin' his neck to get away for if they've got us? I'd say it's the other way round. Likely two or three of 'em butted in here lookin' for us. This McCann wanted to make sure about whose cattle were here. He must of left the others an' the horses up in the pines. When yore brother heard the shootin' he figured the game was up an' lit out pronto. I'll bet he was alone up there. Anyhow, I'm goin' up to find out. We'll know then where we're at. With Manuel posted at the Narrows this McCann can't get out down the gulch. My notion is we've got that guy where we want him."

Gitner shook a huge fist savagely. "I speak for him. Lemme have him an' I'll sure riddle him aplenty," he cried with a fierce oath.

Again the terror that was riding Jasper Stark cried out. "Tell you we're trapped. If ever I get outa here alive"

He did not finish the sentence. But as it stood the meaning was clear enough, a threat to abandon those with whom he was allied, perhaps to betray them. The eyes of Gitner and Dunwig met, and a message passed between them. In that long look he was condemned. For they knew their lives were at the mercy of this weakling who would turn evidence against them whenever pressure was brought to bear. Neither of them doubted that Jasper Stark would save himself at their expense if he could. Every word he had spoken since he burst into the room a half hour ago convinced them that this was true.

"First off, we'll all go up to the pines an' see if anyone is still camped there," Dunwig proposed. "That suit you, Carl? If we bump into this McCann an' his friends we'll fog it out with him."

Gitner straddled to the wall and took a rifle down from the deer's horns on which it rested. "Suits me fine," he boasted. "I always did want another crack at that Wils McCann. I 'most sent him to Kingdom Come oncet."

"I'm sick, boys. Reckon I'll stay here," Jasper said.

"Reckon you won't," Gitner told him with a brutal laugh. "How about it, Mark?"

For a fraction of a second Dunwig's sidling eyes met those of the Texan. "Why no, I 'low he'd better go along, Carl."

The man crouched outside the window knew that it was time for him to be gone. He retreated carefully a few steps, then broke into a run. After he reached his horse and had reclaimed the rifle lying near he hesitated.

"Where do we go from here, Jim-Dandy?" he drawled aloud. "Blamed if I know. The gulch is closed. It would be suicide if we tried to make a break down thataway. It's back to the big rocks for me, I expect."

Already the outlaws were pouring out of the house. From where he stood he could have shot them down in comparative safety, but he could not harden his heart to do that, though he knew they would murder him without scruple if they got the chance. Hurriedly he mounted and rode back into the pines.

"Have to leave you here, J. D.," he told his horse. "I'm playin' for time, old fellow, an' you're too big to hide. So I can't take you along."

He left Jim-Dandy with the pack horse and retreated to the foot of the rock wall. The voices of the outlaws came to him, though he could not make out their words. They had evidently found the two animals and were deciding what to do.

The sound of their voices died away. Probably they had decided to wait till morning. Then they would thoroughly search the valley and find him.

Wilson made his way back to the upper end of the park. The big rocks offered the best cover he had seen for a last stand.

CHAPTER XIV

The Old Maid Sheepherder

Julia stayed at the sheep ranch the night after her brother and his companion started for Guadaloup canyon. It was long before she could get to sleep. The enterprise upon which the two men were embarked was a dangerous one, even though they had gone only to spy out the land. She wished she had insisted more strongly that they take a larger posse, for if they should meet the rustlers and there should be a battle they would probably be worsted. Thinking of it now, in the darkness of the night, their undertaking seemed foolhardy.

She was glad of the darkness and the freedom it brought from the need to talk. Her thoughts were of Wilson McCann. What had he meant when he said he would not tell her his opinion of her? She tried to vision again the look that had accompanied the words, and her pulses throbbed with joy and apprehension. He was no friend. The lines in which their lives had been cast made that impossible. But he was the man she loved. No longer did she deny that to herself. It gave her a stinging delight to admit it. They could be nothing to each other. Never! Never! None the less he was everything to her.

It was long past midnight before her eyes closed. They opened only when the tinkling of knives and forks told her that Ethel was setting the table for breakfast.

"What time is it?" she asked drowsily.

"We've been up hours," Ethel told her. "Ann said to let you sleep. She's had her breakfast and started for one of the camps. You don't have to go home today, do you?"

"Think I'd better. Phil's away, you know."

"Mr. Rafferty will look after things. He's been doing it a good many years, hasn't he?"

During the day Julia continued to argue that she must be getting home, but she made no move to go. The fact was that she was very reluctant to put that half dozen extra miles between her and the men who had gone to Guadaloup. She was not easy in her mind and she knew that whatever news came would reach the sheep ranch before it did the Circle Cross.

Ethel and she washed their hair and let it dry in the sun. The contrast they offered to each other was striking, the one with soft fluffy ripples like molten gold, the other with long abundant tresses black as coal. There had sprung up between them a swift impulsive friendship, an intimacy made possible by their differing temperaments. One was soft and tender and clinging; the other strong and generous and warm-hearted.

When Julia talked of Phil the younger girl's blushes came, but when the conversation veered to Wilson McCann Julia gave no sign of peculiar interest.

Toward evening Ann returned and vetoed Julia's half-hearted suggestion that she must be going. Wherefore the guest stayed another night and was awakened next morning to the odor of frying bacon.

They had not finished eating when a man's voice outside hailed the house.

"Am I Driving You Away?" She Asked at Last.

The man was Dave Stone. He had come, he said, to say good-by before leaving for Texas.

It was Julia, not Ann, who asked him questions.

"Texas! I didn't know you were even thinking of going. How long are you going to stay there?"

"I'm figurin' on joinin' the rangers there?"

"You haven't had any trouble with Dominick or anybody?"

He smiled. "No, ma'am. Nothing like that."

"I wish you wouldn't go. Why can't you stay at the Circle Cross?"

"Every once in a while I get sorta hungry for Texas."

Julia was not one to give up easily, but she did not find it possible to move him from his purpose.

"You talk to him, Ann, while Ethel and I do the dishes," she said at last.

But Ann had nothing to say. She sat mute and still while the Texan maintained as best he could a flow of small talk. Presently she rose.

"I've got to look at the feed troughs," she said.

He walked beside her to the corrals. The girl put her forearms on the top bar of the fence and looked across at the distant Sierras.

"Am I driving you away?" she asked at last.

"Why no, ma'am. I'm just restless."

"I ought not to say anything about it," she went on, with a flare of her old bitterness. "It's not womanly, I suppose. But you're either my friend or you're not. I want to know which."

"I'm yore friend," he said in a low voice.

"All you did was to try to save me from prison and to protect my good name when folks were talking about me. Nothing to speak of, just almost give your life for me. Now you come and say, 'I'm going away,' without telling me why. Is that fair?"

She spoke with such passionate resentment that he knew he could not stand by the reason he had given for leaving.

"Maybe not," he said quietly. "Fact is, Miss Ann, I am leavin' on yore account. It's not fair to you for me to stay. I've worked it all out in my mind. Folks have got a fool notion that—that—"

"—that I'm in love with you," she finished for him.

"No, ma'am, but that I'm right fond of you."

"And since it isn't true, you're going away to stop their talk?"

"Yes, Miss Ann, I'm going away to stop their talk, but not for that reason. I'm Dave Stone, Texas killer. It won't do any young lady's name any good to be associated with mine. When I go the talk will die right down."

She laughed, shortly. "Good of you to be so thoughtful. Why didn't you just send word you were going away?"

"I wanted to see you."

"Well, you've seen me now." She held out her hand. "Good-by."

He shook his head. "I don't want to part thataway. We're friends."

"Only it's better—for me—that we don't see each other. Friends at a distance. Shall we exchange Christmas cards?"

Stone reflected, smiling a little at her tart suggestion. Women were not reasonable. She ought to see that it was right for him to go, that he could not stay and let people talk as though there were or had been something between them. If he walked out of her life the gossips would have nothing to whisper about. Yet it was not a matter he could discuss freely with her.

"If I was like Wils McCann, say, an upstanding young fellow with a good reputation, why it wouldn't be important if folks did talk about us. But I'm different. I'm a bad man, as the sayin' is. My friends suffer from knowin' me. I don't want anything but good to come to you. So I'll just pull my freight kinda casual."

"Who says you're a bad man?" she demanded.

"Why, everybody. That's understood."

"Do you think you are?"

"I expect that's not a fair question," he answered, and again a smile blotted out the impassive coldness of his poker face. "Probably Carl Gitner justifies himself to himself. But the fact remains that I killed Tom McArdle and have killed others."

"No, I killed him," she said, looking straight at him.

"I'm telling the truth, Miss Ann. I shot him."

"Maybe so. I don't know about that. But whether you did or not it was I that killed him. It was my thought, my impulse, and it's my sin." She stopped a moment, shivering at the memory. "I'll have to pay for it all my life."

"It's because I think so much of you that I don't want you to be tainted in folks' minds by their associatin' me with you."

She rejected that with an impulsive gesture. "That's ridiculous. Even if it were true I wouldn't let it influence me. But it's not. People think differently of you now. They know you're not like that Gitner or Jasper Stark."

"No, but I'm still Dave Stone."

"And I'm Ann Gifford, an old maid sheepherder." She looked down with a wry little grimace at her dusty khaki skirt, her coffee-brown hands, and her cactus-torn boots.

"That's not quite how I think of you," he differed.

She looked directly at him, a faint color beating beneath the deep tan on the thin face. "How do you think of me?"

Stone measured his words in order not to say too much. "I think you're a mighty fine an' handsome young woman, one I'll be grateful to as long as I live."

"But that's all?"

"Why, I don't reckon I know what you mean, Miss Ann."

The girl pushed on breathlessly, afraid her courage might fail. "You kissed me once. Why did you do that? Because you were grateful?"

A muscle twitched in his immobile face. "If I did wrong that time—"

She brushed that aside impatiently. "Who's talking about right or wrong? Do you—care for me, Dave Stone, or don't you?"

"You know I do."

"You're not—just grateful?"

"What's the use of going into that?"

"The use? I'm a grown woman, hard and tough like the desert. I know what I want. Don't treat me like a china doll." There was in the manner with which she faced him something of the lean ferocity of the desert she had mentioned. She had cast aside all feminine coquetry, all the allurement of her sex. For she knew that unless she broke through his reserve now he would go away with the word she hoped for unspoken. The situation was beyond finesse.

"Am I treatin' you like a doll?" he asked. "I certainly don't aim to do that."

"Do you claim that you're frank with me—or fair?"

"Fair? Yes, ma'am."

"Not in the least fair. Haven't I any right to help decide about my own life? You want to shield me from what people might say, even at the expense of shutting me off from living." She flung toward him a little appealing and rueful smile. "Why are you making it so hard for me, Dave Stone? I don't want to go all the way. . . Or don't you really care?"

He felt her beating against and wearing away the hard rock of his resolution not to compromise her by involving her fate with his.

"Say I care for you. Would that make it right for me to speak? I'm Dave Stone. We can't get away from that."

"I don't want to get away from it," she answered, her eyes meeting his bravely. "It's Dave Stone I want. I'm tired of fighting. I want to rest. It is only your stiff pride that stands between us—that is, if you do care."

Her work-hardened hands moved ever so slightly toward him. In her look were gifts of more than friendship.

In that long meeting of the eyes the barrier between them was burned away. He knew, by the clairvoyance of love, that nothing else mattered. If he had been a "bad man" he was now one no longer. That belonged to yesterday's seven thousand years. He was at the sunrise of a new day. He had sloughed his past as a forest creature does its horns.

So he took her in his arms and told her, as lovers have since time began, how wonderful she was and how amazing this experience that had come to him. As she looked at him she wondered how she could ever have thought that face impassive and those eyes hard.

An hour later they remembered that this is a world made up of more than two. Slowly they moved toward the house. A cry startled them. Julia was standing on the porch with Ethel. Her hand pointed up the trail.

A horse and rider were coming down it in a very strange way. The man in the saddle sagged forward in the seat like a drunkard. He lurched unsteadily from side to side.

Julia ran to meet him. She stopped the horse and helped the rider dismount.

"Phil," she cried.

He was pale and haggard and piteously spent. His breath came with difficulty. On his shirt below the shoulder was a wide deep stain of blood.

Ethel looked up white-faced at her sister and murmured, "He's dying."

"No," the boy reassured. He closed his eyes, then with an effort opened them. It was to Stone he spoke. "Wils is up there—in Horse Thief park. They've got him cornered—Gitner an' his crowd."

Stone carried the boy into the house and looked to his hurt. "Clean wound in the shoulder. Ought to be all right. He's lost a lot of blood of course, but he'll make that up fast."

In Commemoration of Great Historic Events

Although the Dutch laid claim to the Hudson River region in 1609 and built a fort in 1613, some of the earliest, if not the very first, settlers were fugitives from religious persecutions in France and Flanders, who obtained permission from the Dutch to make their homes in New Netherlands.

In 1924, as part of the observance of the tercentenary of their arrival, the United States issued the special coin and also large-sized special postage stamps of the denominations of 1, 2 and 5 cents. All of these are now prized and worth more than their face value when in fine condition.

On various appropriate occasions the government issues such commemorative coins. Some other special issues were called forth by the commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the discovery of the Hawaiian islands in 1928; the sesqui-centennial in 1926; commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the battle of Bennington and independence of Vermont, in 1927; of the battles of Lexington and Concord in 1925; the Monroe Doctrine centennial in 1923; the Grant centennial in 1922; the Alabama and Missouri centennials in 1921, and the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims in 1920.

Fitted the Case

It has long been the custom for menus in railroad dining cars to be decorated with handsome views of scenery along the line. This, however, is the only time the practice has yielded us a paragraph. On the menu of a "coast-to-coast" appeared the word "Dinner," and above it a handsome view with the title: "Royal Gorge."—S. K. in the Spokane Spokesman-Review.

When Bread Is "Stale"

Definition and explanation of staling: "It is rather difficult to define stalement fully in a few words. From the standpoint of the consumer, bread is considered stale when, measured by the sense of feeling and taste by contact with the skin and palate, it appears dry and harsh, and not acceptable as fresh. There are, of course, various degrees of staleness, and there exists no absolutely definite dividing line between the so-called freshness and staleness of the loaf. In general, however, bread which is termed fresh possesses a crumb which is somewhat translucent, elastic and springy, while the crumb of stale bread is more opaque and at first tough, then later crumbly or hard, with a noticeable lack of flavor."

"I have," answered Senator Sorghum.

"Do you fully understand the subject?"

"No, I sometimes wish I had taken up the Einstein theory instead. You can admit at the start that you don't understand that, and don't have to go on bluffing."

The Comedy

The manager of a small touring company, who played a farce in the big room of a village inn, mentioned to the landlord the quietness of the crowd, which didn't even smile.

"Aye," chuckled the landlord, "I told 'em I'd chuck out the first man that made a sound. I didn't want good actors like you laughed at."

SERIOUS business was now at hand. Washington was elected to attend the First Continental Congress at Philadelphia in 1774. The Congress was held in Carpenter's Hall, and Peyton Randolph, an intimate friend of Washington's was chosen president. The man of Revolutionary destiny was always alert but said little.

ON the night before his departure, Washington gave a dinner at Mount Vernon to his traveling guests, Edmund Pendleton and Patrick Henry. Richard Henry Lee followed later. As the guests were ready to mount Mrs. Washington said she hoped they would be firm. "I know George will," Benjamin Franklin's mission to London for an honorable peace was of no avail and war like temper was increasing.

Lights of NEW YORK

Publishers have as many adventures as explorers. Recent magazine articles, books, and pictures have inspired anyone and every one who ever owned or had any dealings with an animal to attempt to turn such experiences into money. Publishers are offered cat, dog, pig, cow, fox, wolf, and bear stories of all descriptions. They get pretty used to them, but now and then a fellow arrives with something new. Such a fellow showed up at a magazine office the other day. He said he wished to dispose of a story. It was not yet written. His idea, in fact, was that the editor should write the story and they would then split the receipts. Pressed for further details, he admitted that he had the only pack of hounds in the world which could drive a tiger into a corner and keep him there. There were twenty-eight of the dogs.

"To show you I am on the level," said the man, "you can pick your own tiger. Get any tiger you like. I'll bring my dogs. If they don't chase your tiger into a corner and keep him there, I don't want a cent. And, if the tiger should kill any dogs, I'll stand the loss."

Well, nothing could be fairer than that. There was the editor with an office which had four corners, and there was the man with the dogs. All that was needed was a tiger. But the story hasn't been written yet. Magazines haven't much enterprise.

Certainly, when I put on a tin hat and went to France a few years ago, I had no idea that I would some day have a warm friendly feeling for two sons of the crown prince of Germany. But that is just how any of you would feel concerning these youngsters, if you happened to be around with them. Louis Ferdinand and Frederick William Hohenzollern are two of the most likable young visitors the shores of the United States have seen in a long time. Prince Frederick likes to play golf, tennis, and the piano, but most of all he likes to run, throw the javelin, swim and sail. Prince Louis, who has been working in the Ford factory in Detroit, where the workmen call him by his first name, plays the violin and likes to drive an automobile and to fly. Whenever he gets a bit of time off, he rents a plane and goes for a ride over the highway of the clouds. Frederick is a blond, who looks a bit like his cousin, the prince of Wales, only he is larger and huskier. Louis is a dark, studious looking young man, with a courteous, but impulsive manner and an interest in everything around him. He is a good mixer, who always will make his way in any company he cares to find.

Howard Allen Trafton, the poster artist, had a job decorating a smoking room on a steamship. He used to go down and work while the boat was in port. Leaving late one night, he carried his wet brushes and paints in a burlap bag. A customs man stopped him; demanded to know what he was lugging. He said it was paint.

"Nose paint, I guess," said the officer. "Lemme feel in there."

"Okay with me," said Mr. Trafton.

The customs man must have spent quite a while trying to get the colors off his hand and coat sleeve.

Did I ever tell you the story Billy McCarney told me of a fighter and an actor? McCarney was sitting in his office wondering how he was going to get a sparring partner for a big fellow he was managing, when he was told some one wanted to see him. The man was tall and husky. He said he was one of the Romanos, doing a strong man act in vaudeville. He liked to box. Could McCarney get someone to spar with him? McCarney surely could. There was a big farmer sitting in his office who might be induced to put on the gloves. The thing to do was to sock him good and hard, so he wouldn't get fresh and then he would be a good punching bag. The actor said that was fine. So Billy McCarney went back and told the fighter he had found him a sparring partner. The fellow had been a ham actor. The thing to do was to sock him right away and show him his place. The men squared away and both led with terrific rights; both landed. It was a good bout. Billy McCarney was much pleased. The boxer was Jess Willard; the actor was Victor McLaglen.

GAME OF HOUSE-BUILDING

For two players only. Each player has five men or buttons. These are set on the starting line in the middle, arrows pointing in the direction each must go. Dice are used to determine moves or if no dice are available small slips of paper with numbers corresponding to dice numbers are satisfactory. The object of the game is to get one's five men from roof to cellar in as few moves as possible. The one who does this wins. Moves can only be made when even numbers are drawn. The uneven numbers do not permit of a move, and the player drawing one or throwing one must lose his turn, but nevertheless he must count his draw or throw as one move. He cannot move into the last space or let his man finish unless he draws the exact number which will take him outside the cellar line, providing he has two spaces left to go. In other words he must wait until he draws two—he cannot move on either one or three. Each game won scores the winner one hundred and the goal of five hundred or five games is the series.

Returns Gift Overalls Because of High Duty

Elyria, Ohio.—A pair of overalls which he had sent as a gift to a friend in Germany was recently returned to Jose Frassel, tailor here, because it require's a week's wages to pay the import duty on them.

Accompanying the returned overalls was a letter in which the German friend stated that the import duty amounted to 8 marks and 60 pfennig, or $2.10 in American money, which amounted to a week's wages.

The Kitchen Cabinet

Good Things of Various Kinds

A SALMON dish flavored with almonds makes an excellent late supper dish. It may be prepared ahead of time, and this is an advantage.

Almond Souffle of Salmon.—Shred one pound of cooked salmon, add one-fourth pound of finely minced blanched almonds, one teaspoonful each of onion juice and worcestershire sauce, one egg, white and yolk beaten separately; salt to season and one cupful of whipped cream folded in the last of all. Turn into well oiled molds and set in water. Cook for thirty minutes or until the center is firm. Serve with a white sauce.

Shrimp Supper Dish.—Take one pound of small shrimps, two large slices of bread. Moisten the bread with two cupfuls of milk, add a teaspoonful each of onion juice and worcestershire sauce, three sprigs each of parsley and thyme, one bay leaf, a blade of mace finely chopped, one-fourth of a grated nutmeg and a tablespoonful of butter. Mix well and bake in a casserole; cover with buttered crumbs.

Cream Cheese Pie.—Mix one-half cupful of sugar, one tablespoonful of flour, one-eighth teaspoonful of salt and the grated rind of an orange. Add one and one-half cakes of cream cheese, work in one-half cupful of cream, add two beaten egg yolks and a few drops of vanilla, then fold in the stiffly beaten egg whites. Pour into a pastry shell and bake in a slow oven until firm. Serve cold with strawberry jam.

Cheese Loaf.—Take two cupfuls of grated cheese, one cupful of bread crumbs, one cupful of mashed potato, two tablespoonfuls of minced parsley, one-eighth teaspoonful of pepper, one-half teaspoonful of salt and two well beaten eggs. Mix the cheese, bread crumbs, potatoes and seasonings. Add the yolks of the eggs and mix well, then fold in the white of the eggs. [illegible] into a [illegible] bread pan and bake in a hot oven twenty minutes or until firm.

How It Started

By Jean Newton

Calling the Maid "A Biddy"

WE HAVE an inquiry as to the origin of the term a "biddy" for a servant or maid of [illegible].

Most of us will remember the popularity of the expression a decade or two ago, although one does not hear it used so frequently today.

The expression is an abbreviation or diminutive of the Irish name, "Bridget" and its use in this connection originated in the heavy immigration before the war of Irish domestic servants, that is women servants. Hence the "Biddy."

EIGHT DAYS WIFE OF RICH OIL MAN NETS NURSE $6,000

Elderly Bridegroom Given Divorce on Plea She Denied Him Love.

Wichita, Kan.—Six thousand dollars for eight days of married life may not be a "financial bargain," as her seventy-seven-year-old husband charged she was seeking, but that is what Mrs. Zelma Grammont-Rutter, twenty-three, got when her marriage to Henry C. Rutter, wealthy retired farmer and oil royalty holder, was dissolved here.

The romance of the Rutters started last December when the aged capitalist was taken to a hospital with pneumonia. Under the care of Zelma Grammont, pretty and blond nurse, he recovered and when he left the hospital for his daughter's home Zelma went with him, still as nurse.

Eloped With Nurse.

Zelma liked to play cribbage; so did Rutter. She liked bridge—and Rutter liked that game, too. He bought her an automobile, a diamond ring. Then one day Rutter's seven children learned their father had eloped with his nurse.

After eight days' honeymoon Rutter left his bride and filed suit for annulment of the marriage, declaring that Zelma "married me as a financial bargain and said she did not love me." He asked to invalidate a premarital contract whereby she was to give him her love and affection, plus her nursing abilities and home-making qualifications, in exchange for a check for $3,000, half of his estate upon his death and a promise not to give away any money or sign any legal or financial papers without her formal consent.

Further, Rutter charged that Zelma had "flattered and cajoled" him into marriage, taking advantage of his weakened physical condition, which, his attorney declared, made him "less on guard than usual."

Zelma was ejected from the $10,000 home Rutter had bought her; she was prohibited by court order from seeing or communicating with her aged bridegroom, was forbidden to spend the $3,000 check or dispose of the jewels and other property she had acquired since her marriage.

The bride promptly fired back with a court order of her own, tying up Rutter's property and demanding a mental and physical examination.

Spectators Snicker.

Snickers swept over the courtroom continually when Rutter was placed on the stand by his attorneys and admitted that he had proposed to her several times, refusing to take "no" as an answer and pointing out all that he could do for her.

The defense rested without calling a witness—Rutter had been all that was necessary.

District Judge Grover Pierpont, trying the case without a jury, deliberated several days, then denied the annulment, but held the premarital contract was void.

The judge called attorneys and principals together to discuss a possible reconciliation.

"I'm ready to become his wife again whenever he wants me," pretty Mrs. Rutter said.

"Our client won't agree to that at all." Rutter's attorneys declared.

Finally they agreed upon $6,000 settlement and Judge Pierpont then granted Rutter a divorce on the grounds of "neglect of duty," apparently on Rutter's statement that "she told me she didn't love me."

Coyote Bands Slay Deer on U. S. Reservation

Hollister, Calif.—Coyote bands, lead by gaunt, gray prairie wolves, are slaughtering the deer herds of Pinnacles national monument, visitors to the reservation report.

Fearing the deer would be completely wiped out, national park authorities sent a government trapper into the reservation several months ago. He caught forty coyotes and three prairie wolves.

The recent discovery of eight carcasses of deer slaughtered by coyotes and wolves, however, has caused Pinnacles officials to renew their trapping activities.

Petting of Fawns Brings Big Fine in California

San Francisco. — Tender-hearted persons who yearn to pet "those sweet little fawns" in the hills south of here must control that yearning, the state fish and game commission warns.

And it will cost just $500 to pet a small deer.

Because the doe often refuses to reclaim her fawn if it has the odor of a human hand upon it the state prohibits by law the picking up, moving, or petting of fawns.

The small deer often become attached to persons who pet them and will follow them like pet dogs, game officials state.

Would-Be Bandits Lose $1 When Holdup Fails

New Haven, Conn.—It cost two would-be drug store bandits $1 in a holdup attempt here. They handed William H. Templeton, clerk, a dollar to be changed and pulled out revolvers when he opened the cash register. Templeton shouted. The bandits ran. Police arrived. Templeton still held the bill in his shaking hand.

Is Most Spectacular of Federal Agencies

Bureau of Investigation Is Least Advertised.

Washington.—One of the least advertised and yet most spectacular of all federal agencies is the bureau of investigation of the United States Department of Justice. To most casual citizens the bureau is just a name, if it is known at all. The credit for famous cases in which the clinching evidence against an international thief, a defaulting banker, or a confidence man on the high seas was furnished by an agent from the bureau is generally given the police.

The bureau agents, credited as being the ace detectives in the United States and American possessions, avoid the limelight. Although every agent is trained in law and accounting their work is highly secretive. Publicity is avoided as in contrast to the courting of publicity by most investigating bodies.

Some of the most dramatic crimes, made famous in play and story, come under the jurisdiction of this body. Their field includes crimes on the high seas, treason, violation of the national banking and bankruptcy laws, thefts from interstate shipments, bribery, crimes on Indian reservations, escaped federal prisoners, civil rights, and domestic violence, and all others not assigned to a specific agency.

In two fields, especially, the Department of Justice agency is the protector of civil rights and liberties. As a co-ordinating policy agency the bureau aids in the capture and conviction of thousands of state and national laws. At Washington the most complete fingerprint bureau in the world is maintained for the aid of all police agencies.

Not only are the prints of federal violators maintained but the prints of any fugitive wanted by any police department for any crime from leaving the scene of an accident to robbery with a gun are kept. A free "posting" system, by which any police chief can have the fingerprints of a fugitive placed on file is maintained. The prints of every arrested man is checked each time against the files and co-operation given the corresponding police chief.

The arrest and conviction of Gene Elms for murder is a case illustrative of this work. On February 7, 1931, the bureau received from the police department at Tulsa, Okla., the fingerprints of Gene Elms with a notation that he was wanted for the murder of a police officer. Checking the files it was ascertained that two days previously a fingerprint card was received from St. Paul, Minn., stating that one Raymond Parker had been arrested for investigation. The two prints were identical and Elms was tried on the murder charge in Oklahoma and sentenced to life imprisonment. Another murder suspect was arrested through the same system as a result of leaving the scene of an automobile accident.

The other field in which the bureau comes most in contact with business and civic leaders is in the investigation of all bankruptcy frauds. Practically the only protection legitimate business has against the confidence man and swindler who avails himself of the loopholes in the bankruptcy laws, the bureau investigators are constantly busy checking the schedules of bankrupt petitioners. Thousands of dollars in hidden assets have been returned through this agency.

All violations of the national banking act come under the jurisdiction of the bureau. One of the most noted Chicago cases of recent years was the arrest and conviction of John E. Malloy, assistant cashier of the Lawrence Avenue National bank. Malloy misappropriated funds and showed up in Milwaukee, claiming to have been the victim of a holdup in the bank. Through the reconstruction of practically the entire ledger system of the bank his story was proven false and Malloy was sentenced four years in prison and fined $5,000 on a charge of making false entries and embezzling $59,900.

Investigation and search for the fugitive is never given up by the Department of Justice investigators. One of the longest successful searches ended in the arrest and conviction of Grover S. Elam, a bank embezzler from the First National bank of Highland, Wis.

The bank failed in 1931 and an investigation by the bureau showed $50,000 unaccounted for. Elam was indicted, but because he was suffering from a bad gasoline burn a warrant was not served pending his recovery. In the meantime he disappeared. Special agents of the bureau of investigation instituted a search for him and a few weeks ago he was located in Chicago under the name of Albert S. Nagel and is being returned to Wisconsin for trial.

The bureau has been in existence for 24 years and comprises 22 filed offices located throughout the United States and its possessions. In each office there is stationed a staff of trained investigators under the supervision of an investigator in chief. The national director of the bureau is J. Edgar Hoover, with the Chicago office being in charge of W. A. McSwain.

King of the Future and His Sister

This attractive little brother and sister are grandchildren of the king and queen of the Belgians, and the little boy may some day succeed to the crown since he is the only son of the present heir to the throne, Prince Leopold, duke of Brabant. The photograph was made by special permission of the children's mother, the duchess of Brabant who, before her marriage, was Princess Astrid of Sweden. The boy is Prince Baudouin, who was two years old on September 7, 1932, and his sister is Princess Josephine Charlotte, who is five years old.

French African Mission Acts to Save Wild Game

Elephants and Rhinoceroses Being Killed Off.

Paris.—A French government mission sent into Africa to study the native fauna reported that unless drastic measures are enacted immediately, elephants, horned rhinoceroses, giraffes and dwarf hippopotamuses will be killed off in the French colonies within a few years.

The mission recommends a Franco-British-Belgian treaty forbidding the export of rhinoceros horns—particularly sought by Chinese for their alleged medicinal value—and severe laws to curb the shooting of animals by native and white game hunters.

"The worst enemies of the native fauna of Africa are the natives who kill them for their meat, hide and tusks, and the sportsmen of Europe and America, who organize great expeditions for the sole purpose of acquiring hunting trophies for the decoration of their smoking rooms," the report says.

The report points out that Belgian Congo soon will be without elephants except those kept in national parks. Each battalion of natives working on government building projects is allowed to kill one elephant per week for food. The great herds of the Congo will be thinned readily if each of the score of battalions is allowed 52 elephants a year.

The mission suggests that smoked or frozen meats be substituted for the fresh meat, for, too often, only a little of it can be eaten before the remainder spoils from the heat. Of 100 elephants killed in the Congo, 98 are killed by natives—particularly for the ivory.

The inquirers returned convinced that the advance of civilization will drive out the animals, for they will be deprived of the space and water they need. They urge that there be no limit placed on the number of lions and panthers killed, but suggest that the French administration draw up an animal limit for native and white hunters on other animals.

Martins Make Home in Traveling Crane

Longview, Wash.—For three successive years two martins have made their nest and raised their families of young birds in a closet on a hammer crane on the Long-Bell Lumber company dock, totally disregarding the fact that the crane travels up and down the dock a distance of a half mile a day. The mother and father birds show no annoyance when workmen enter the closet—more than 50 times daily—and fondle the young fledglings.

The martins as believed to be a species known as "coffee birds," native of Brazil.

U. S. Finds Stone Walls Do Not a Prison Make

Washington.—The federal government is becoming more inclined every day to trust prisoners and place them in unwalled camps instead of prisons.

The prison division of the Department of Justice reports that in the two and a half years since the establishment of the unwalled camps 6,678 persons have been confined in them. Although the guards are unarmed, there have been only 161 escapes from such camps. Of those 131 were recaptured.

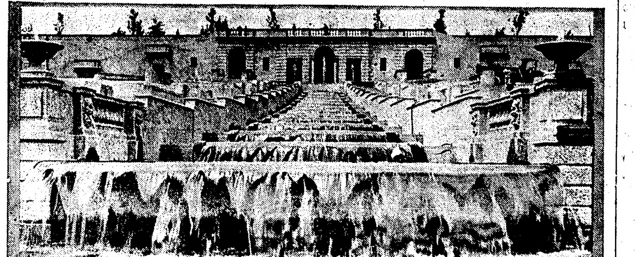
New Cascades Entrance Visitors to Washington



Proclaimed to be one of the most beautiful sights in Washington, the recently completed cascades in Meridian Hill park are attracting many visitors. Pays Schemer to "Keep Credit Good"

It has been said that it would well repay a man with a criminal mind to spend the first thirty years of his life in building up a reputation for absolute integrity and straight dealing, in order to make great coups later on.

"The ablest men that ever were," wrote Bacon, no mean authority on commercial morality, "have had all an openness and frankness of dealing, and a name of certainty and veracity; but then they were like horses well managed, for they could tell passing well when to stop or turn; and at such times when they thought the case required dissimulation, if they then used it, it came to pass that the former opinion spread abroad, of their good faith and clearness of dealing, made them almost unsuspected."

This is a quotation which would not be out of place on Ivar Kreuger's tombstone. The secret of his success, the secret of the world-wide confidence which he enjoyed, was that he was never caught telling a lie. No one was ever able to prove that he told an untruth.

His word appeared to be his bond, with the result that he could make what now seem to be the most unlikely assurances and be implicitly believed. Bacon said such men would be "almost unsuspected." Kreuger carried it a stage further. He was completely unsuspected.—T. G. Barman in the Atlantic Monthly.

How Modern Women Lose Pounds of Fat Swiftly—Safely

Gain Physical Vigor — Youthfulness With Clear Skin and Vivacious Eyes That Sparkle With Glorious Health

Here's the recipe that banishes fat and brings into blossom all the natural attractiveness that every woman possesses.

Every morning take one-half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water before breakfast—cut down on pastry and fatty meats—go light on potatoes, butter, cream and sugar—in 4 weeks get on the scales and note how many pounds of fat have vanished.

Get a bottle of Kruschen Salts—the cost is trifling and it lasts 4 weeks. If even this first bottle doesn't convince you this is the easiest, safest and surest way to lose fat—if you don't feel a superb improvement in health—so gloriously energetic—vigorously alive—your money gladly returned.

But be sure for your health's sake that you ask for and get Kruschen Salts. Get them at any drugstore in the world.

Indistinct Message That Had Daddy "Sitting Up"

An Indianapolis man was accustomed to receiving a telephone call from his ten-year-old son each afternoon. The call came as usual on a recent day.

"Hello, son, how is everything at home?" he began.

The reply was indistinct, but sounded as if the boy had said: "Mummy's bad sick."

Startled, the man held the receiver more tightly. "She is? What's the matter with her?"

"I don't know. She only ate half a carrot and now she's eating grass."

This information was more startling than ever. The man had sudden visions of his wife having lost her mind and parading through the yard, gnawing at grass.

"Listen, son, talk louder. Did you say mother was sick?"

"Naw," came the disgusted reply, "not mother—bunny."—Indianapolis News.

Fable of the Criminal Outfit

By GEORGE ADE

©, 1931, Bell Syndicate.—WNU Service.

ONCE upon a Time a Business Man named Kingsbury Gilpin was riding on top of a Bus.

It was a bright, snappy Day, with an early Harbinger of Frost in the air and Mr. Gilpin had just booked a large Order, so he was feeling top-high and Aces. It happened that there was seated alongside of Mr. Gilpin a Bird of stern Countenance who didn't look as if he had a Smile left in stock, so Mr. Gilpin thought he would try to cheer the lugubrious individual by Chatting with him pleasantly in regard to the Weather.

"It's a swell Day, ain't it?" asked Mr. Gilpin, as he turned and faced the Stranger.

"Aha! Just as I suspected!" exclaimed the Party thus addressed. "You have Licker on your Breath. You have been defying the Constitution and By-Laws. I am a Special Officer, assigned to the Department of Sniffing. Come with me!"

"Nothing has passed by my Lips today except Cherry Phosphate," protested Mr. Gilpin. "What you smell is a Special Preparation which I use on my Hair. It contains a Percentage of Alcohol."

"I never knew a Violator who didn't try to pull an Alibi," said the Enforcement Officer. "Furthermore, you have acknowledged your Guilt by owning up to Possession. This is the most important Capture I have made in Weeks."

Now it happened that while Mr. Gilpin was being taken to the Hoosegow, his elder Son named Wilfred was only two Blocks away, with a Brief Case under his arm. He was taking a set of Contracts over to a Lawyer to have a few Jokers inserted. He started to Whistle and a Cinder blew into his Mouth.

Perhaps it was a Judgment from Heaven.

Chip of the Old Block.

He spat it out. There is no Law against Whistling on a Public Highway, but any kind of Spitting, Cinder or no Cinder, is just the same as robbing the Ice Box in an Orphan Asylum.

Wilfred felt a pair of Strong Hands gripping at his Wing-Pipe.

"Arrest this Man!" shouted one of those Bystanders who is always asking to have some one arrested.

Then a Policeman came ponderously and struck Wilfred over the Head with his Club, after which he inquired as to the Facts in the Case. As several excited Spectators pieced together all the Details of the Outrage, the Mob which had collected, became uneasy and then turbulent.

"Hang him! Hang him!" shouted the furious Citizens.

"No!" exclaimed the Policeman, fighting back the Crowd. "His Life belongs to me."

Within a few Minutes after Kingsbury Gilpin had been chuckled into a dark, subterranean Cavern reserved for the more hardened Type of Offenders, the Steel Door clanged again and into the dark and suffocating Gloom came another Prisoner, hurled with great Force by the Rough Attendants.

Mr. Gilpin crawled over to wipe the Blood from the unhappy Wretch and recognized—his Son!

"To what do you attribute your Downfall?" asked Wilfred of his Father.

"Lax Discipline and unpardonable Negligence on the Part of my Parents," replied Mr. Gilpin.

"Same here," said Wilfred.

Just then they heard the Chains dragging again. A Key turned in the cumbersome Lock. The bobbing Light of a Candle showed the Skeleton Bars in painful distinctness.

A stumbling Football and a dark Figure was thrust into the Dungeon. The Newcomer felt his way along the Wall and came Face to Face with Mr. Gilpin. The two Men peered at each other.

"Eugene!"

"Master!"

It was Eugene Wellington, the Hired Man.

"You here, Eugene?"

"Yes, Master—I!"

When Girls Leave Home.

"Speak, man! Be brave. It may relieve you to Confess."

"They've had Spotters at work since Spring and at last they nabbed me. I forgot to separate the Garbage from the Ashes."

Two Hours passed. The Gilpins were trying to sleep and Eugene was weeping silently. It was the Latter who aroused his Companions.

"Look!" he said, "a Woman!"

Sure enough, the Guards were dragging down the Stone Stairway a fashionably-clad Young Woman whose Hair would have been hanging down her back in Confusion, except that it had been Bobbed.

"I didn't see it!" she shrieked. "I was looking the Other Way."

"Tell that to the Judge," replied the Turnkey, and pushed her into the Cell.

She saw the Men back in the Semi-Darkness and shrank from them in Terror.

"Fear not," said Kingsbury Gilpin. "We are Enemies of Society, but we do not harm defenseless Girls."

"Father!"

"Leonora!"

It was the Only Daughter of Kingsbury Gilpin, recently returned from a Finishing School on the State Road leading from New York to Boston.

After she had calmed down she told her Story. It seemed that a Green Light was showing and the Traffic Cop had his Right Hand up, so she made a Left Hand Turn, whereas she should have waited for a Blue Light and a Left Hand Signal and then gone Straight Ahead.

When she had concluded her Father was convulsed with Grief.

"I blame myself as much as I blame you," he said, brokenly. "I heard all of those Stories about Finishing Schools, but I wouldn't believe them."

It must have been along toward 3 p. m. when Mr. Gilpin was aroused from an uneasy Slumber by Leonora, who whispered to him: "Father, are you strong? Are you brave?"

"Speak!"

"Who do you think is here?"

"The Pastor of the Presbyterian Church?"

"No, Anthony!"

A Terrible Night.

"My little Boy? My prattling, laughing, innocent Anthony?"

"Yes, that is He lying on the Floor over by the Doorway. They used the Militia to bring him in."

"And what has he done to merit this awful Disgrace?"

After they recovered from the first Shock they discussed among Themselves as to whether Mr. Gilpin should put in a Plea of Insanity or have the Chamber of Commerce, the Rotarians and other Organizations name a Committee to call on the Governor and ask for a Pardon.

It seemed that Ages had passed and then the Guard brought them some Water and Dry Bread. In Hotels and Restaurants it often happens that Patrons are compelled to eat heavy and indigestible Bread, fresh from the Bakery, but the Inmates of Penal Institutions always get it Dry.

Eugene Wellington had rolled up his Coat and put it under Anthony's head and the Boy was moaning pitifully. All of the Others were silently crouched about, immersed in melancholy Reflections. Finally there was Silence.

"He sleeps," whispered Eugene.

"It is well," said Kingsbury Gilpin, softly, "for it will be a sad Awakening."

"Hush! What was that?"

"I heard naught."

"Yes, it is the Shuffle of Feet and the metallic Clangor of Prison Gates. Another Soul is doomed to Torture."

Enter Madame.

All of them listened. They heard the Muffled Curses, the dull Resonance of Steel against Steel and Words of harsh Command.

Then a Scream. It was the hysterical Cry of a Woman in Agony.

"Ruffians!" exclaimed Mr. Gilpin. "They send a weak Woman to a Living Death and gloat over her sufferings."

He sprang to his Feet and shook the massive Bars with the Fury of a Madman.

"Brutes! Cowards!" he shouted.

Anthony awoke and began to Sob with Fear.

It was a dirty Lay-Out, all around, no matter what you say.

Two Guards staggered to the Doorway. They dragged between them a Woman. She had fainted.

"In with her!" cried one burly Attendant, hoarsely.

The Door opened and the reeling Woman fell into the Arms of Kingsbury Gilpin.

Tenderly he lifted the stray Locks concealing her Face.

"My Wife!" he shrieked.

It is as the Reader has surmised. The new Prisoner was Mrs. Gilpin.

"Where am I?" she asked, faintly, as she opened her Eyes.

"Here, with your Husband, and Wilfred, and Leonora, and Anthony and also Eugene Wellington, the Hired Man."

"It all comes back to me now," she said, in a weak voice. "I would have complied, at the first Request, but the Woman who made the Complaint had been using Henna and Wore Gold in her Teeth and I wouldn't let that Hussy get away with Anything. The next Thing I remember, I was in the Blue Wagon."

"What was it all about, Honey?" asked Mr. Gilpin, tenderly.

"Just as I told you. I was at the Movies and failed to remove my Lid."

Long-Standing Dispute Over Discovery of Tea

The discovery of tea seems to be hidden in the mists of conflicting legends. China places the discovery back in 2700 B. C.; Japan credits it to a pious disciple of Buddha; the monks in Thibet were said to have discovered tea when they noticed the good effect upon their goats from feeding upon a strange glossy leaved plant.

Tea, after the people of the Orient had enjoyed its restful qualities for many centuries, gradually found its way to other sections of the world. The Dutch brought tea to Europe in 1610 and the English became acquainted with it in 1615. However, Arabia was familiar with the beverage about 850 and the Venetians learned of it in 1559. Tea for a time sold in England for from $30 to $50 a pound. The leaves reached Russia in 1618 and arrived in America in 1650.

Accounting for Stubble

"Why does Stubble sit around all day and never do any work?"

"When he was a boy his teacher admonished her pupils: 'When in doubt, don't'—and Stubble being always in doubt, just don't!"

Medical Sheep Shears

Somehow or other modern Russia manages to be different and to do things differently. She even does so when it comes to shearing sheep. What they really do is to pluck the wool right off the poor creatures. However, they dope the animals first with a medicine which makes them shed their wool. To prepare the sheep for the plucking a small dose of a preparation of heavy mineral salts is given them. This is said to act on the synthetic nerve system and in two or three days the wool is loose enough to pick off.

Luck and a smart wife can carry a man to glory.

One doesn't laugh loudly at life's troubles unless one has hysterics.

Artificial Heart

A Vienna physician, Doctor Eisenmenger, has perfected a machine or "artificial heart" that pumps the blood when the real healt stops. By use of this new apparatus persons apparently dead have been brought back to life. It keeps the blood circulating for a while although the heart has stopped. The machine is designed to apply alternate pressure and suction to that part of the chest containing the heart, so that blood is alternately sucked into that organ and forced out again, simulating approximately the normal circulation maintained by the heartbeat.

Whiskers are due to either laziness or to certain ideas of manly comeliness. And some of these ideas are correct.

Discouraging the Kicker

The mechanical farrier has appeared in the western states of America for the handling of vicious steeds brought in to be shod. The animal is placed in a rugged wooden frame and haltered there. A sling operated with a winch and rope cable then lifts the horse until his feet barely touch the floor. In this position the outlaw is practically helpless and much of the fight already taken out of him. A metal clamp atached to a pipe arm is then fastened around the fetlock of the hoof to be shod, and by means of gears controlling the movement of the arm, the foot is raised to the position desired.

If they only had arms like an ape, some men might still prefer to live in a tree.

WARNING

to PROPERTY OWNERS

TODAY a letter came to my desk that deeply impressed me. It was written by a woman—the mother in a typical American family. Her little home had been saved from foreclosure by a coat of new paint, for which a part of their meager savings had been paid.

Those few gallons of fresh paint had so revived the appearance and enhanced the value of the property that the mortgagee had consented to renew the loan . . . and the little home was saved.

I could not help thinking of the thousands of homes and buildings that are shabby and unattractive today due to several years of neglected painting; of the millions of home owners who, because of reduced incomes and enforced economy, have been obliged to sacrifice painting for taxes, interest, assessments, to say nothing of food, clothing, heat and other essentials of comfort and health.

You have seen these paint-starved houses and buildings, as have I. They are everywhere about you. Perhaps your home is included.

Do you understand what they signify? Do you realize what will happen to wood or metal that is literally naked of paint if these houses and buildings face the attack of another season of rain, snow, ice, and frost?

Never in the history of our country has the situation been paralleled. Property owners face an added burden of expense amounting to millions of dollars for repairs and replacements next spring.

And the crisis, in my opinion, will be reached this coming winter when paint of four, five, and even six years exposure to the weather will be unable to resist the elements—when badly weathered wood and metal will be easy prey for rot, rust and decay.

Today the big question facing thousands of property owners is plain. It is "paint or pay." Either you must invest a little this fall in new paint or you must take the risk of paying many times the cost of paint to repair the damage done by rot, rust and decay this winter.

Even at the sacrifice of other things, have your house or buildings completely repainted now. No investment you can make will pay better dividends. And nothing you can buy will make you and your family feel so uplifted and cheerful.

If you cannot arrange to do a complete repainting job now, at least give the badly weathered places a coat or two of protecting paint.

Look especially, to the window sills, thresholds, outdoor porches and steps; the joints of porch railings and palings; the bases of pillars; the edges of eaves; the roof; the gutters and down spouts. These are the vital spots where water lodges—where ice and frost settle—where rot and rust attack first.

A few dollars' worth of good paint, applied now, will protect these vital spots—will tide you over this crucial winter. And it will probably save you a much greater expense for repairs and replacements next spring and summer.

Under existing conditions, you may be tempted to buy a cheap paint because of its low price. I hope you will not make this costly mistake.

Even on sound lumber, inferior paint is a poor bargain. But on weathered wood, which is very porous, such paint is worse than useless. It gives you a false feeling of security and leaves you without protection.

Prices of well-known, established brands of paint are now the lowest in fifteen years. Enough good, dependable paint can be purchased for a few dollars to protect all the badly weathered surfaces on your building.

Again I repeat, do a complete job this fall if you can. But at least do the vital exposed places before it is "too late."

HON. MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of State.

Pursuant to Mason's Minnesota Statutes of 1927, section 46, I herewith transmit a statement of the purposes and effect of the proposed amendments to the constitution of the state of Minnesota which are to be submitted to the electors of the state at the 1932 general election, in accordance with certain acts adopted by the legislature at the 1931 session thereof.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 1

By the adoption of Laws 1931, chapter 420, the legislature has proposed an amendment to article 9, section 1, of the constitution, relating to taxation. This section now reads as follows:

"The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected for public purposes, but public burying grounds, public school houses, public hospitals, academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning, all churches, church property and houses of worship, institutions of purely public charity, and public property used exclusively for any public purpose, shall be exempt from taxation, and there may be exempted from taxation personal property not exceeding in value $200, for each household, individual or head of a family, as the legislature may determine: Provided, that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation, and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, modify or repeal any existing law providing for the taxation of the gross earnings of railroads."

If amended as proposed, this section will read as follows:

"The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected for public purposes, but public burying grounds, public school houses, public hospitals, academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning, all churches, church property and houses of worship, institutions of purely public charity, and public property used exclusively for any public purpose, shall be exempt from taxation, and there may be exempted from taxation personal property not exceeding in value $200, for each household, individual or head of the family, as the legislature may determine. The legislature may enact any law required to make the taxation of national banking associations conform to the laws of the United States. Taxes may be imposed upon incomes and on franchises and privileges measured by income, including income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies, which may be classified, and which taxes may be graduated and progressive, and the legislature may prescribe reasonable exemptions, and such taxes may be in lieu, in whole or in part, of taxes on any class or classes of real or personal property as the legislature may determine. It shall not be necessary to submit to a vote of the people any law imposing a tax upon the income, franchises or privileges of railroad companies. Any and all provisions of the constitution of this State inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed. Provided, that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation, and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, modify or repeal any existing law providing for the taxation of the gross earnings of railroads."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment

The proposed amendment is intended, first, to give the legislature specific authority to enact such laws respecting the taxation of national banking associations as will conform to the laws of the United States. The laws of the United States at present provide in substance that the states may tax the shares of a national banking association, provided that the rate of tax on such shares shall not be greater than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such state coming in competition with the business of national banks. At present the laws of Minnesota provide that shares of such a banking association shall be assessed at thirty-three and one-third per cent (33 1/3%) of their true and full value. Moneys and credits and mortgages upon and executory contracts for the sale of real estate are taxed in this state at a lower rate. The supreme court of the United States has held that the Minnesota plan of taxing shares of a national banking association is invalid because these shares are taxed at a higher rate than moneys and credits and mortgages on and executory contracts for the sale of real estate. Under the proposed amendment it is intended to give the legislature the power to enact laws for the taxation of national banks that shall be in harmony with the federal statutes on that subject, even though such laws might offend other provisions of the state constitution.

The remainder of the new matter which would be placed in said section 1 by the proposed amendment is intended to give the legislature specific authority to enact laws providing for a tax on incomes, and on franchises and privileges measured by income, including income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies. It is proposed that all incomes may be classified and that taxes may be graduated and progressive; that is to say, the rates may be different on incomes of different sizes. It is intended that the legislature shall have power to allow reasonable exemptions from such taxes and to provide that such income taxes may be in lieu, either in whole or in part, of taxes on such other classes of real or personal property as it may determine. It is proposed that any law imposing a tax upon the income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies need not be submitted to a vote of the people, as now provided by article 4, section 32a of the constitution.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The proposed amendment, if adopted, will have the following effect:

1. The legislature will have specific authority to make the laws of this state relating to taxation of national banking associations conform to the laws of the United States, notwithstanding any other provision of the state constitution.

2. The legislature will have specific authority to adopt a graduated and progressive income tax law, including a tax on franchises and privileges, as measured by income, and on the income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies. The legislature may allow reasonable exemptions and may provide that the income tax shall be in lieu, in whole or in part, of taxes on certain classes of real or personal property. Such laws taxing the income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies will not be subject to a vote of the people as provided by article 4, section 32a, of the constitution.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

First:
TAXATION OF INCOME AND NATIONAL BANKS.

Amendment to section 1, article 9, of the constitution of the State of Minnesota, relating to taxation, to authorize the imposing of taxes on incomes, and on franchises and privileges, including income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies, measured by income, which taxes may be classified, and may be graduated and progressive and providing for exemptions therefrom, and that such taxes may be in lieu, in whole or in part, of other taxes on real or personal property. It shall not be necessary to submit to a vote of the people any law imposing a tax upon the income, franchises or privileges of railroad companies. The legislature may enact any law required to make the taxation of national banking associations conform to the laws of the United States.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 2.

By the adoption of Laws 1931, chapter 418, the legislature has proposed an amendment to article 16, section 3, of the constitution, relating to taxation of motor vehicles. Said section now reads as follows:

"The legislature is hereby authorized to provide, by law, for the taxation of motor vehicles, using the public streets and highways of this state, on a more onerous basis than other personal property; provided, however, that any such tax on motor vehicles shall be in lieu of all other taxes thereon, except wheelage taxes, so-called, which may be imposed by any borough, city or village. Any such law may, in the discretion of the legislature, provide for the exemption from taxation of any motor vehicle owned by a nonresident of the state, and transiently or temporarily using the streets and highways of the state. The proceeds of such tax shall be paid in to said trunk highway sinking fund."

If the proposed amendment is adopted, this section will read as follows:

"The legislature is hereby authorized to provide, by law, for the taxation of motor vehicles, using the public streets and highways of this state, on a more onerous basis than other personal property; provided, however, that any such tax on motor vehicles shall be in lieu of all other taxes thereon, except wheelage taxes, so-called, which may be imposed by any borough, city or village, and except that the legislature may impose such tax upon motor vehicles of companies paying taxes under gross earnings system of taxation and upon the right to use such vehicles upon the public highways notwithstanding the fact that earnings from such vehicles may be included in the earnings of such companies upon which such gross earnings taxes are computed. Any such law may, in the discretion of the legislature, provide for the exemption from taxation of any motor vehicle owned by a nonresident of the state, and transiently or temporarily using the streets and highways of the state. The proceeds of such tax shall be paid in to said trunk highway sinking fund."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment

Under our present laws certain corporations, associations and individuals pay taxes to the state based on their gross earnings. Our supreme court has held that corporations, associations and individuals paying a gross earnings tax in the operation of their business in lieu of other taxes are not subject to payment of taxes on their motor vehicles operated on the highways of the state. It is intended by this amendment to authorize the legislature to make such vehicles subject to the motor vehicle tax, notwithstanding the payment by the owners of a gross earnings tax.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The effect of the proposed amendment to article 16, section 3, will be to permit the legislature to impose the same tax on motor vehicles using our public highways and owned by a corporation, association or individual paying a gross earnings tax as is imposed on other motor vehicles.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

Second:
TAXATION OF CERTAIN MOTOR VEHICLES.

Amendment of article 16, section 3, of the constitution, relating to the taxation of motor vehicles of companies paying taxes under the gross earnings system of taxation.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 3.

By the adoption of Laws 1931, chapter 417, the legislature has proposed an amendment to article 8 of the constitution by adding thereto a new section, to be known as section 8, to read as follows:

"Any of the public lands of the state, including lands held in trust for any purpose, may, with the approval of a commission consisting of the governor, the attorney general and the state auditor, be exchanged for lands of the United States as the legislature may provide, and the lands so acquired shall be subject to the trust, if any, to which the lands exchanged therefor were subject, and the state shall reserve all mineral and water and water power rights in lands so transferred by the state."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment

By article 8, section 2, of the constitution, school and swamp lands owned by the state may not be disposed of other than at public sale. The purpose of the proposed amendment is to abrogate this requirement, in so far as the disposal of such lands to the federal government is concerned, by authorizing the legislature to provide, with the approval of a commission consisting of the governor, the attorney general and the state auditor, for the exchange with the United States of such state lands in return for lands owned by the federal government, the state specifically reserving all mineral and water and water power rights in lands so transferred, and the lands so acquired being subject to the trust, if any, to which the lands exchanged therefor were subject.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The effect of the proposed amendment, if adopted, will be to abrogate the constitutional requirement that school and swamp lands be disposed of only by public sale and will permit the legislature to authorize the exchange of such lands for lands of the United States, with the approval of a commission consisting of the governor, the attorney general and the state auditor. All mineral and water and water power rights in lands so transferred are reserved to the state. The proceeds of sales of federal lands so acquired by exchange would be subject, under the proposed amendment, to the same trusts as the state lands which were conveyed.

The ballots used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

Third:
EXCHANGE OF STATE AND FEDERAL LANDS.

Amendment of article 8 of the constitution, authorizing the exchange of public lands of the state for lands of the United States, as the legislature may provide.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 4.

By the adoption of Laws 1931, chapter 419, the legislature has proposed and amendment to article 9, section 10, of the constitution. This section now reads as follows:

"The credit of the state shall never be given or loaned in aid of any individual, association or corporation, except as hereinafter provided. Nor shall there be any further issue of bonds denominated 'Minnesota State Railroad Bonds', under what purports to be an amendment to section ten (10) of article nine (9) of the Constitution, adopted April 15th, 1858, which is hereby expunged from the Constitution, saving, excepting and reserving to the state, nevertheless, all rights, remedies and forfeitures accruing under said amendment. Provided, however, that for the purpose of developing the agricultural resources of the state, the state may establish and maintain a system of rural credits and thereby loan money and extend credit to the people of the state upon real estate security in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by law, and to issue and negotiate bonds to provide money to be so loaned. The limit of indebtedness contained in section 5 of this article shall not apply to the provisions of this section, and the purposes for which the credit of the state or the aforesaid municipal subdivisions thereof may be given or loaned as herein provided are declared to be public purposes."

If the proposed amendment is adopted, the section will read as follows:

"The credit of the state shall never be given or loaned in aid of any individual, association or corporation, except as hereinafter provided. Nor shall there be any further issue of bonds denominated 'Minnesota State Railroad Bonds', under what purports to be an amendment to section ten (10) of article nine (9) of the Constitution, adopted April 15, 1858, which is hereby expunged from the Constitution, saving, excepting and reserving to the state, nevertheless, all rights, remedies and forfeitures accruing under said amendment. Provided, however, that for the purpose of developing the agricultural resources of the state, the state may establish and maintain a system of rural credits and thereby loan money and extend credit to the people of the state upon real estate security in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by law, and to issue and negotiate bonds to provide money to be so loaned. The limit of indebtedness contained in section 5 of this article shall not apply to the provisions of this section, and the purposes for which the credit of the state or the aforesaid municipal subdivisions thereof may be given or loaned as herein provided are declared to be public purposes.

"The legislature may authorize the taxing of any lands, title to which is acquired by the state through the operation of such system of rural credits, during the period such lands are held by the state, and for the assessment thereof for benefits arising from improvements, and may provide for the payment of such taxes and assessments out of the funds arising from the sale of such bonds or the operation of such system of rural credits. In lieu of such taxation the legislature may appropriate out of such funds without discrimination to all the school districts, towns, counties, cities, villages and boroughs in which such lands are located sums of money not exceeding the amounts which would have been realized by such governmental subdivisions from the assessments against or taxation of such lands if privately owned."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment

By reason of the operation of the Department of Rural Credit the state of Minnesota has acquired title to a large amount of improved farm lands. Property owned by the state is not subject to taxation. The purpose of this proposed amendment is to give the legislature constitutional authority to subject lands acquired through the operation of the system of rural credits to taxation and the payment of assessments for improvements, and to provide that such taxes and assessments be paid out of funds arising from the sale of bonds or the operation of such system of rural credits. It is further intended to permit the legislature to appropriate out of such funds, without discrimination, to all the school districts, towns, counties, cities, villages and boroughs of the state in which such lands are located, sums of money not exceeding the amounts which would have been realized by such governmental subdivisions from the assessments against or taxation of such lands if privately owned.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment

If adopted, the proposed amendment will enable the legislature, in its discretion, to subject real estate acquired by the state through the operation of the system of rural credits to taxation and the payment of assessments, the same as lands privately owned. The legislature may provide that such taxes and assessments be paid from the rural credit funds, or it may appropriate from such funds to the school districts, towns, counties, cities, villages and boroughs of the state in which such lands are located, without discrimination, an amount not exceeding what would have been realized by these governmental subdivisions from assessments against or taxation of such lands if privately owned.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

Fourth:
TAXATION OF RURAL CREDITS LANDS

Amendment to section 10 of article 9 of the constitution of the State of Minnesota, to authorize the taxing of lands acquired by the state through the operation of the system of rural credits and the appropriation of moneys from the funds of the Department of Rural Credits.

Moved to Sask. Canada

Rev. and Mrs. O. J. Haukeness and family left last week for their new home at Archerwill, Sask. Canada where Rev. Haukeness has accepted a call to serve a congregation of the Lutheran Free Church.

They moved here from Wisconsin about two years ago and while here Rev. Haukeness served two congregations of the Lutheran Free Church and the past year he has done Mission Field work. We regret very much to announce the departure of Rev. and Mrs. Haukeness and family from our community but, we join their many friends in wishing them success and good look in Canada.

Funeral services were conducted here on Saturday afternoon from the Free Mission Church for the little four year old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Dan Ness. The little girl passed away at their home on Sunday morning, Oct. 2.

Rev. Thev. Myhrer conduced the services and interment was made in the Ridge Cemetery here.

Dan Ness and family moved to Thief River Falls recently.

No Man Works Harder

There is no man in Congress who works harder, or is more sincere and indefatigable than Conrad G. Selvig of Crookston. His seriousness is a by-word in Washington, and his earnestness always is accepted as one indication of merit in any Congressional proposal he supports or in any action he initiates.

A perusal of congressional records will reveal that Mr. Selvig does not skip from tasks to requests in the political will o' the wisp way. He, of course, does not ignore his constituents in the smaller things, but he does interest himself in the more important matters with a persistence that accomplishes results and stamps him as a sincere public servant.

Before Mr. Selving was elected to Congress in 1926, on the Republican ticket, he was for 16 years director of the Northwest School of Agriculture and Experimental Station. This indicates his interest in agricultural matters, and has also given him a standing in such matters among his colleagues that has proved to be very advantageous to this State. His knowledge of the middlewest is unchallenged, and he has legislative ideas that have developed into a program that should not be interrupted. His constituents like his determined procedure and his workmanlike manner, and proved this by electing to Congress three times.

Minnesota needs congressmen of Mr. Selvig calibre. He should be given a vote in November that will send him back to Washinghton.

—17—

"Fellow got me—while I was comin' down the canyon," Phil whispered. "We fixed it, Wils an' I did—that I was to come for help if he got caught. He was at the other end of the park lookin' up brands when I heard the shootin'. I lit out. Get help to him quick."

The message given, Phil fainted.

By the bedside of the wounded boy they held a hurried council. Doctor Sanders had to be brought and a posse to be raised. But it was essential that help be got to Wilson McCann without delay. Many valuable hours would be lost before Dominick Rafferty could be reached to guide an armed party into the hills.

"If I only knew the way," Stone lamented. "But I'd never find the place."

Instantly Julia caught his meaning. "You'd go alone—if you could?" she cried. "Then I'll take you. I've been there."

She had flashed from despair to sparkling life. Her tortured soul craved the chance to do something for the man she loved beleaguered in the hills.

"You wouldn't be afraid to go with me?"

"No."

"Then we'll start right now."

To make sure, Stone questioned Phil as to the exact location of the hidden valley in relation to Guadaloup canyon. For there was a chance that Julia's memory might fail at the critical moment.

Ann started for the Circle Cross and Doctor Sanders at the same time Julia and Stone took the trail in the opposite direction. It had been Phil's own request that Ethel stay with him as nurse until the doctor came.

The parting between Ann and her Texan was not dramatic.

"You'll be careful, won't you?" she asked.

His brown hand met hers in a strong grip. "I sure will."

"I'll look after him," Julia promised.

"And we'll take care of Phil," Ann said. "Good luck."

Driven by her fears, Julia would have set too fast a pace if Stone had not moderated it.

"What do you think? Will we get there in time?" she asked.

"That's a question I can't answer, Miss Julia. I'll say this: Wils McCann is a sure enough fightin' buckaroo. If they didn't get him at the first jump he's liable to stand 'em off quite a while. You never can tell."

"If he only hadn't gone—if he'd waited and taken a posse," she cried.

"I'll say 'Amen!' to that," he agreed. "But don't you worry. We're liable to find him kickin' real lively. Wils is six-foot of wildcat an' he'll take a lot of killing. If he's had half a chance for a getaway I'll put my money on him. He's a better man than Carl Gitner any day of the week."

It was two hours past noon when they reached Gundaloup canyon.

"Not far now," the Texan told Julia cheerfully, glancing at the sun. "We'd ought to be there before dark."

"What's your plan?" she asked.

"Haven't any. We'll have to go up the gulch. If we get in we'll see what develops."

"I was thinking that maybe I could ride on and ask to see Mr. Gitner. If he knew a posse was on the way he wouldn't dare to do anything." With a question she voiced another thought in her mind, quaveringly: "Do you think Jas is with him?"

"Now, don't you worry about that either. We don't know a thing about it. Like as not he isn't."

"I thought if I could get to talk with Jas—"

"We'll see how that works out. I don't reckon you'll get a chance. This is mighty serious business. It wouldn't surprise me if the rustlers had lit out for Mexico. Now they've been located they won't stick around long, for they know they'd be smoked out soon as a posse can get to 'em."

The directions given by Phil, together with Julia's recollection of the country, guided them straight to the gulch up which the trail to Dunwig's ranch led. They fell into single file. Julia thought she ought to go first because she was a woman and would not be attacked, but the Texan absolutely refused to consider such an arrangement.

"You're goin' up into the park only because I'm scared to leave you alone down here," he told her with a smile. "Do you reckon I can hide behind you an' hold my haid up afterward?"

They traveled the whole length of the gulch unchallenged, passed through the narrow exit, and entered the grassy valley beyond.

"Looks like the birds have flown," Stone suggested after a long look around.

Even as he spoke there came the sound of a shot, and after it a rattling volley of them.

Julia, much excited, pointed to a small puff of smoke in the upper end of the park. "Look! Look!" she cried.

"You wait here," Stone ordered as he gave his horse the spur and galloped forward.

After a moment of indecision the girl followed.

CHAPTER XV

Homeward Bound

Wilson McCann knew that with the coming of dawn the storm would break upon him. The escape of Phil would drive the rustlers across the border. But there was no immediate haste. They would have thirty-six hours probably before a posse could arrive, and meanwhile they would take pains to destroy the man who had spoiled their plans.

It was not possible to find an ideal location for defense, but he chose a sand pit surrounded by boulders. Without a fire the night was chill. There were pinon knots near he could have lit, but he did not intend to start a smoke signal for his enemies.

The hours wore away slowly. He catnapped a little, but he dared not let himself get sound asleep for fear they might creep on him in the darkness.

Gray light sifted into the sky. A meadow lark piped up its gay chirrupy challenge. The jig-saw top of a white range showed above the opposite cliff. An agitated patch of greasewood brought him to a focussed attention until a coyote trotted out from its cover and ambled away on a search for breakfast.

Dawn was at hand. He ate a sandwich and drank from the canteen he had replenished at a spring.

"Soon now," he told himself.

He saw signs of life about the house. Smoke rose from the chimney. A man came out and went to the spring for water. Through his field glasses he presently saw others emerge. All carried rifles. They trooped to the corral, saddled horses, and rode cautiously into the pine grove. Evidently they wanted to make sure he was not hidden there. After a consultation they rode down the hillside and disappeared into a dip of the valley floor.

They came out of the shadowy dawn like wraiths of evil, not boldly riding grouped together but slinking, coyote fashion, through the mesquite that fringed the park walls. He counted them—one, two, three, four.

He watched them dismount and take their horses back of a clump of small pines. One by one they came out and disappeared into the chaparral. They had guessed he was in the boulder field and were creeping forward on a still hunt to find exactly where.

The net was tightening. Wilson knew the enemy was drawing closer. Once or twice he observed a slight rustling of greasewood or manzanita. But those stalking him kept well hidden.

Cool though he was, his pulses pounded. Inured to danger from early youth, he knew he had never been in as tight a place as this. The meadow lark flung out again its gay love song. He wondered if he would be alive tomorrow to hear that rising lilt and cadence.

The ping of a bullet whistled past. He ducked instinctively. From a clump of bushes three hundred yards away a puff of smoke thinned into the clear air. He watched that brush screen, but not steadily, since his glance had to sweep the whole field of vision in front and discover any suspicious object or any slightest unusual motion of vegetation.

Those surrounding him were all old-timers except Jasper Stark, and he had been brought up on the frontier. Wilson understood what that implied.

The Net Was Tightening. Wilson Knew the Enemy Was Drawing Closer.

They would take no unnecessary chances, would make use of their knowledge of the terrain to get him at a disadvantage if possible. The business of exterminating him might take many hours, but they were prepared to attend to it efficiently without undue loss. He held a strong defensive position in the sand pit flanked by boulders. That there would be no attempt to rush him out of it by a frontal attack in the open he was convinced.

The development of the day's campaign proved his conclusion a correct one. After the first shot there was no other for at least an hour. It was quite likely that the man who had located his position was communicating with the rest.

Waiting was a nerve-racking strain. The silence was ominous, yet every little rustling of twigs suggested that a foe might be lurking in the bushes there. His alert gaze continuously swept the landscape. Every bush of greasewood, every clump of mesquite fell under his keen observation.

A spurt of sand flew up beside him. He caught sight for a moment of a face peering over the edge of a rock and flung back instantly a bullet in answer to the one intended for him. The face was withdrawn.

From the right a shot sounded, and another from the left. They were fired from invisible rifles by invisible foes. Wilson shifted his position a few yards to get out of sight behind two flat-faced boulders.

The sun climbed higher. By noon the attackers had worked Wilson out of the sand pit and driven him from rock to rock. He had fired perhaps eight or nine times usually without actually seeing the persons at whom he shot. So far as he knew none of his bullets had scored a hit. His enemies were not taking chances. Their intention evidently was to force him from the cover of the rocks and pick him off as he dodged for the chaparral. The plan was one very likely to succeed, McCann judged.

By mid-afternoon it came on to rain mistily. He had reached the edge of the boulder field and within a few minutes must have been dislodged from his last stand in it. The rain gave him a respite.

He slipped deeper in to the rock field, moving warily so as not to be caught unprepared. What the outlaws would do under the circumstances was uncertain, but he guessed they would follow him to the open expecting him to make a run for his life across the valley.

Not fifty feet from him, on the other side of a ledge of rock, a revolver boomed. He crouched, every sense keyed up, nerves taut.

A moan came to him, followed by a cruel laugh.

"You've got yores, Jas Stark," he heard a remembered voice say. "Thought you'd fix it for yoreself by givin' us away, didn't you? I'll learn you to try to play traitor with Carl Gitner."

Swiftly Wilson clambered up the rock ledge and looked over. The big Texan was standing straddled over the man he had just shot down and was sneering at him.

"You always was a white-livered coyote, Jas, an' you got what was comin' to you. When they find yore body, if they ever do, they'll think Wils McCann bumped you off. I'm figurin' on gettin' him too muy pronto."

From his place on the shelf above Wilson spoke in a low hard voice. "Then get busy, you murderer, an' come a-shootin'."

Gitner looked up, snarling. The eyes of the two met in deadly combat for a fraction of a second before the revolvers began to roar.

Of the number of shots fired Wilson lost count. In the smoke he saw the face of the Texan, distorted with rage and pain, sinking down to the ground. He kept on throwing bullets at the man till his revolver was empty, for the outlaw had not stopped firing.

Wilson reached for the rifle he had laid beside him. But there was no need to use it. Gitner had fallen across the body of the man he had shot. He lay, limp and lax, arms outstretched, no sign of life in him. Cautiously McCann descended, never lifting his eyes from the prone body after one swift glance round to make sure none of the other rustlers were in sight.

Gitner was dead. Not a flicker of life remained in him, not a muscle still twitched. Wilson dragged the body from where it lay on that of Jasper Stark.

The eyes of the wounded man fastened on those of McCann.

"He shot me from behind while I wasn't expectin' it," he explained feebly. "I'm dyin' fast."

Wilson lifted his head and offered him a drink from the canteen, but Jasper rejected the water with a weak gesture of the hand.

He Understood the Shudder That Went Through Her Slender Body.

"No use. I'm done for," he said. "Listen. I've been a bad lot. Seems like I never got a square deal. Anyhow, I went bad. But tell Jule I'm no rustler. Gitner brought me here an' I couldn't get away somehow. The cards was stacked so I had to take a hand."

"I'll tell her."

"Tell her . . . Gitner shot Dad an' you that day. . . . Nobody knew it, but the old man fired Carl that mornin' . . . Claimed he'd been a bad influence over me. I was with Carl when he shot Dad, but was scared to tell . . . an' Dad hadn't treated me white."

A shout at the edge of the boulder field brought Wilson to attention. He answered the call, for he recognized the voice of Stone. Presently the Texan stood beside them looking down at the dying man.

"You shoot him?" he asked.

"No. Gitner did it, from behind."

Jasper confirmed this.

The sound of light footsteps brought Wilson round, gun in hand. Cautiously he circled a big boulder, and stood face to face with Julia.

"Thank God," she cried at sight of him, and her voice broke in a wail of gladness. "I was afraid. I thought maybe—"

Her hands went out to him in a little gesture of weak reaction from the strain, and somehow they were in each other's arms.

For a moment Julia rested, trying to control her sobs. After the long strain she felt a touch of hysteria. She had been afraid, desperately afraid, that she would find him stark and lifeless; and behold! he was warm and strong, ready to love and to be loved.

Her grip tightened round him convulsively. "I saw them, as I came across the valley—three of 'em—riding hard for the canyon. I thought they had—I thought—"

He understood the shudder that went through her slender body. A swift leap of joy throbbed his pulses. This dear girl cared for him. Down through all the ages her sweet brave soul had come to meet and mate with his. This was his first instinctive reaction; the next was that she must be prepared for the tragedy awaiting her.

Gravely he looked into her eyes. "I have bad news. You must have courage."

Her mind flashed to the truth. "Jasper!"

"Yes. He's been badly hurt."

"Not you." It broke from her in a cry of horror.

"Thank God, no. Gitner shot him treacherously."

"Where is he?"

"Come," he said, and he led her to the spot where her brother lay.

She went down on her knees, with a wailing sob, beside him. He was sinking fast, but he recognized her.

"Jule," he said faintly. "Gitner . . . got me . . . from behind . . . I . . . had it comin'."

The girl looked up quickly at Stone. "Can't you do anything for him?" she begged.

The Texan shook his head, but it was Jasper who spoke.

"No use . . . I'm going fast . . . He shot Dad, too, Gitner did."

The girl's arm pillowed his head tenderly. She forgot he was a ne'er-do-well and worse, that he had been discredited and disgraced. All she remembered was that he was her brother, the little boy with whom she had played and quarreled and made up, one around whom a hundred dear memories twined.

"I've been a . . . bad lot," he murmured. "If you'd—pray for me, sis."

She did, brokenly, with a heart from which welled love and tears.

Within the hour, peacefully, he passed away.

The two men were grateful to him. He had not told the whole truth. If he had been guilty of complicity in his father's death Julia would never know it now. She could not wear her heart out in bitter shame, since both of those who knew the facts were lying here dead. Her grief could be clean sorrow.

They carried the body of Jasper to the cabin and laid it on one of the bunks.

Hours later, in the middle of the night, while Julia lay sound asleep, worn out by her exertions and her sorrow, Dominick Rafferty and his posse reached Horse Thief park. Not till morning did she know that they had come.

While she was asleep their plans had been made. They would bury Gitner on the edge of the rock field and bring Jasper's body back to the Circle Cross. Meanwhile Stone and McCann would ride with her to the sheep ranch.

To her anxious inquiries Dominick reported Phil doing well.

After breakfast the three started homeward.

In Julia's grief there was an element of relief that at moments distressed her. For months she had been oppressed by fears and doubt and shame. These were gone. The end had come, and it was not so bad as she had dreaded. Wilson McCann had explained to her that her brother was not a rustler but had been brought there by Gitner and killed because he knew too much. She was anxious to believe this, to believe that he had been weak and not wicked. The conviction that he would have gone from bad to worse she pushed from her and refused to consider, but it was this feeling that made the loss of Jasper bearable. In the hour of his death at any rate he had come near to her and clung to the comfort she had to offer.

They rode through the golden dawn, for the most part in silence, below them lilac lakes of light in the shadowy hollows of the hills. Julia, riding knee to knee beside her lover, felt him very close to her. Words were not necessary to tell her with what a tender care his sympathy enfolded her. She knew that the barriers built between them had been swept away as though they had never existed.

Out of the fierce and ruthless desert he had come to her, bringing its strength and endurance, the deep-hidden tenderness and the imagination that transforms it from a devouring and rapacious Sahara to a fairyland of magic light and shadow.

She knew he would not speak to her yet while her grief was green. Today was to be for her dead brother. All the years to come were to be for him and her. Not even the eyes that met hers would tell the story that filled his heart, not until he felt the time had come.

Julia loved him for it, for the strength that held repressed the emotion of this straight-backed brown-faced rider of the plains.

Once only she yielded to the feeling that surged up in her. It was when they came to an opening in the hills and looked down on the Painted desert set in its rose and golden envelope of air.

"The morning of the world," she whispered.

He looked at his Eve, for one vivid moment the mask off. Their eyes fastened, plunged to the bottom of each other's heart.

"Of our world," she added, and in her dusky eyes was reflected the glow of the newborn day, warm, vital, sparkling with hope.

Wilson McCann drew a deep breath of joy. Never in all his hard years had he known a soul so radiant, so noble in its generous gift of living, as hers. She was to be his mate. She would bring to him all the warmth and color of her shining glory. The beauty of life flooded his being to the point of ecstatic pain.

His brown hand went out to hers in a strong grip.

"Yes, of our world," he murmured.

[THE END.]

Inventor Seeks Secret of Philosopher's Stone

An inventor is said to be endeavoring in Paris to prove that he can make gold from sand. He claims that some time ago he produced ingots of gold from sand taken from the shores of the Mediterranean. Will he succeed now?

The search for an invention that will enable common substances to be turned into gold dates back to the early days of science. All through the Middle ages alchemists were engaged in trying to discover the philosopher's stone which would enable this to be done.

Probably it is possible, for radium has shown us that one metal may change into another. In course of time, though, radium, now the world's most valuable metal, changes into dull, common lead. The process takes millions of years, and science knows no way of hastening it.

The Paris inventor states that he performs his miracle by means of ultra violet rays. A distinguished French scientist who watched earlier experiments describes how he saw metal slowly deposited upon a nickel plate; after a time this metal was treated with mercury, and a fraction of an ounce of pure gold was obtained.

Political Party Symbols

The original use of the mule to signify the Democratic pary, and of the elephant for the Republican party is said to have been in a cartoon by Thomas Nast which appeared in Harper's Weekly of January 15, 1870. This cartoon showed the animals identified with the various political parties of the time escaping from a zoo.

Joy in Work

Is there not rather a tendency as we grow older to lose our enthusiasm, to get a little dull, a little blunted, and to say that we have sobered down? Yet how a joy in work carries a man on! It drives him forward in the absorbing pursuit of an ideal, through the rough and smooth places of the world, forgetting all else but the object of his search, in invention, in labor, in art, and—yes—in holiness—Canon Newbolt.

Bullet's Penetration

A bullet has more penetrating power at 30 feet than at 2 feet, because it has "gone to sleep" like a top and the "wobble" is gone.

Ways of the Kurds

Kurdistan is a province in Persia inhabited largely by Kurds, a race of wild and lawless people. Kurds also are found in Turkey and Russia, where they live in the mountainous regions and mix brigandage with their nomadic traits. There are approximately 800,000 Persian Kurds, 1,650,000 Turkish Kurds, and 50,000 Russian Kurds. Although the Kurds are a wild and somewhat primitive race, they take great pride in their ancestry, many families tracing their descent back to the Omayyad caliphs. Sinna, the capital of Kurdistan, is famous for its beautiful rugs, some of which bring handsome prices.

Museum of Sounds

An "audible museum" or a museum of sounds has been organized in Berlin under the direction of the ministry of ports. Here there is a gigantic collection of phonographic records representing calls, music and characteristic noises of all kinds. This includes the wail of the Korean, the merry song of the Rumanian tailor, the whoop of the American cowboy and the lingering call of the Spanish night watchman. There are also records of the voices of many distinguished persons.

Slowest Train Discovered

Australia believes it has the slowest train in the world. It is the "tea and sugar" special, which carries stores from Port Augusta to settlers along the route to Kalgoorlie. The schedule calls for a week to travel the 1,051 miles, and a week for the return trip. Practically the only passenger is William Cowan, the railway's undenominational missionary, whose "parish" covers the entire line. He carries hundreds of newspapers for distribution on each trip.

Co-Operation

Ant society is similar to human society in that individuals co-operate for the good of the group; individual specialization of function with resultant division of labor makes for greater efficiency in the capture of energy, protection against enemies, and reproduction; and the social co-operative mechanisms are capable of extension to include animals belonging to other species which thus become incorporated into the society.

Makes You Lose Unhealthy Fat

A lady from Norwich, Conn., writes: "I lost 16 lbs. with my first bottle of Kruschen. Being on night duty it was hard to sleep days but now since I am taking Kruschen I sleep plenty, eat as usual and lose fat, too."

To take off fat—take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast—one bottle that lasts 4 weeks costs but a few cents—get it at any drugstore in America. If this first bottle fails to convince you this is the SAFE and harmless way to lose fat—your money gladly returned.

Don't accept anything but Kruschen because you must reduce safely.

Mother gives credit to Eagle Brand

● Little Rose Marie Haggerty of Pueblo, Colo., at 1 year, 7 months.

"WE STARTED our baby on Eagle Brand at three months," writes Mrs. W. F. Haggerty, 1016 Carterette Ave., Pueblo, Colo., "and she is perfect now. She has won in three baby shows, and I think Eagle Brand ought to have the credit. She is 1 year, 8 months old now, and has never been sick, not even a cold—and I will send our family doctor's statement if you wish.

"The texture of her skin is just like velvet. I sure have praised Eagle Brand, for I think it has made her beautiful.

"The other day, I was visiting at the hospital and one of the men called a doctor to see her and he asked was she bottle fed and when I told him Eagle Brand, he said, 'Well, Eagle Brand ought to see her' so that is why I am sending the picture."

Fable of Surrounding Endicott

By GEORGE ADE

©. 1932, Bell Syndicate.—WNU Service.

ONCE there was a Married Couple that was blessed according to Custom and Precedent. The important It was a highly-colored and wriggly Boy weighing close on to 10 Pounds. The Father, who had suffered unspeakable Agonies during the Ordeal, was known as Henry or Hen and the Mother, who also was among Those Present, bore the old-fashioned Monicker of Martha, so the Offspring for no particular Reason, was Christened Endicott because that Label sounded like Money and Social Eminence.

Let us take a Peek at the Biographical Data surrounding the Parents so that we may better understand the Policy which they adopted for the upbringing and guidance of the First-Born.

Henry came from a Farm, where he slept on a Straw Tick, plowed through the Snow Drifts to the Little Red School House, associated with a sporty Hired Hand and toiled under the hot Sun for Nothing a Month. Later he did Janitor Work and lived on Soda Crickers and other Food devoid of Vitamins while struggling through a Sectarian College. When he arrived in the City he lacked about Ten Beans of having Anything at all and the only Fact that saved his Boarding House from being a Flop Joint was that the Windows had Lace Curtains.

Henry grubbed and saved and kept a Gimlet Eye on the Main Chance and presently Owned a newly-painted Home which was mortgage-free, and a stream-line Roadster and a shapely Partner who had Eyes like a Girl of 16 and knew-how to keep House.

The Touch System.

Martha came from a Small Town where her no-good Dad wore the same Derby Hat and solicited Insurance for many Years before he was buried by the Lodge. She had to make her own Clothes and waited on the Table while attending Normal School. For a while she Taught and then she achieved great Popularity by combining rapid Short Hand with Correct Spelling and became an Ornament to a large Business Concern. After bumping the Bumps and running the Gauntlet and swimming the Rapids and being tried by Fire, she had her own Apartment and a Wardrobe, without losing her Identity as a Member of the Female Sex, and then Henry discovered her and hounded her into taking a Chance.

Here were two Self-Mades who had demonstrated that the Path to Success is paved with flinty Stones and bordered with Thistles. Henry and Martha had arrived because they got out and mingled with all kinds of ornery Mortals and wrassled with Circumstances and were not afraid of Perspiration.

So they figured that to make a Neat Job of little Endicott, they should protect him from all the Hardships they had endured and surround him with all of the sweet and civilizing Influences which had been denied them. In this Respect they were running true to Form. It is hard to find Parents who have any Faith in old-fashioned Recipes. If they traveled in the Grit they want the Youngsters to ride on velvet.

Having proved that Assets have no Value unless they are won in Battle, they proceed to spoon-feed the Childrer and hire Foreigners to wait on them.

These two anxious Parents read books on the Subject and learned that their precious Jewel should be nurtured to Greatness by Contact with all that is True and Beautiful and Good. They sat up Nights to dope out the proper Environment.

The Big Idea is that a young and responsive and sympathetic Being who leans up against Knowledge and Culture will, by Capillary Action, absorb all of the Ingredients which will make him high-brow and useful and looked up to and envied.

If you surround the Little One with Masterpieces of Art, he or she will come to know the Differences between Good Pictures and those appearing on the Outside Cover of a Story Magazine.

Ushers in a Theater learn the Music of the Opera, without any Attempt to memorize it. The Melodies soak into them.

Kids who are dragged to Church get the Scripture and the Hymns even if they have no Enthusiasm for Sacred Themes.

Even the Noodle-Heads who are carted over to Europe find themselves steeped in History and Architecture and Table d'Hotes and come back different.

Mud Hens With Big Ideas.

Any tall-grass College can get the Text Books used at Yale, Harvard and Princeton but when they try to duplicate the Expense Accounts, they fall down. If the Freshman wishes to learn New Tricks from the gilt-edge Products of the Brownstone Avenues, he must take a long Ride on the Train.

He can acquire Facts in any Public Library and get Mental Discipline out of a Correspondence Course, but if he wants the old Savoir Faire (with the Accent on the Salve) and the Air of Distinction and that haughty Something-Or-Other which enables a Snipe to look down, from Heights above at an Elephant, he must mingle with the Face Cards. He may not learn to do anything right but he will be so swanky and exhibit so much Side that no one will ever dare to offer him less than $10,000 a Year in the way of Salary.

Henry and Martha had been Mud Hens brought up in the Marsh, but they were determined that Endicott would be a Golden Pheasant, surrounded by Flower Beds and Fountains.

They began to teach him French while he was Teething. Endicott must have been puzzled for Weeks at a Time, trying to determine which was really his Mamma: Mamselle, the Sanitary Nurse, the Kindergarten Specialist or the Psycho-Analyst who was making a Study of his Responses, which probably means Something to those who are up with the Times.

When other Boys were mastering Marbles, he was taking Lessons on the Violin. While many poor Urchins were roaming the Fields barefooted, looking for Green Apples and Snakes, the Heir-Apparent had on the Fauntleroy Regalia, including Silk Stockings, and shiny Pumps, and was learning how to enter a Ball Room. His Guardians and Keepers and Tutors and Trainers and Handlers and Rubbers used a Mechanical Appliance on his Face so as to put his Nose in the Air and give him that Suggestion of Sniffiness which is always a Valuable Asset to any Boy who is ashamed of his Parents.

They regulated his Diet, his Gestures, his Pronunciation, his Complexion, his Amusements, his Reading, his Hours of Sleep, his Finger Nails and his Moral Nature. They worked on him the same as Luther Burbank would have applied himself to a new $20,000 Species.

Fudge Instead of Football.

He was kept in a jeweled Box, surrounded by Tissue Paper and Cotton Batting.

When the iceman came, he was taken to the front part of the House for fear he might hear something which would corrupt his Vocabulary.

The only Young Persons permitted to come in at the Tea Hour and join him in a Glass of Malted Milk were those Hot-House Products who were guaranteed to be free from Freckles, Slang and the Normal Instincts of Youth.

When he finally went to College, a large Delegation went with him and put more than 80 Sofa Pillows in his Room and had the Curtains arranged so that the Morning Sun would not strike him in the Face, thereby causing him to start the Day in a Peevish Mood.

Even if the Football Candidates did call him Queenie, he could afford to regard them with Disdain, because he knew more about Porcelains and Walter Pater than the whole Rowdy Bunch put together, and the Wife of the Assistant in Chemistry often said that his Fudges were in a Class by themselves.

He came back from the Varsity with a London Accent which can be acquired only by those who are born far from Great Britain. He had acquired no Vices except that of taking Aspirin for a Headache.

A good many low-brow Spectators on the Side-Lines had predicted that two Hubbard Squashes could not get together and produce a Lily, but it seems that they were wrong, inasmuch as Endicott now has the most interesting Collection of Postage Stamps outside of the Museums.

Historic Tobacco Pouch Now in French Museum

A papal tobacco pouch has been presented to the Museum of Rouen. It was once the property of Pope Pius VII, who was consecrated to papal honors in 1800. Whether he ever made personal use of this tobacco pouch is not known. He presented it to Cardinal Cambaceres, one time primate of Normandy, as a mark of esteem. It is a work of art, being decorated with gold, pearls and enamel. It has had a picturesque history. When Cardinal Cambaceres died he bequeathed it to his physician, Doctor Trehet. During the Franco-Prussian war this papal tobacco pouch was hidden away in a wine cellar at Saint Ouen de Thouberville, Eure. The house above was burned to the ground by the Prussians on December 24, 1870. The pouch was untouched by the fire, and until recently it has been in the possession of the Duputel family.

Maid Wed to Goat

Incredible as it may seem, a young Indian girl was recently married to a goat at Ramakrishnapura, a village near the Howrah suburb of Calcutta. The girl's two sisters were widowed at an early age, and, to save his third daughter from the stigma of early widowhood, her father directed that this ceremony should be carried out. The theory behind the practice is that if fate has doomed a girl to be widowed young and she goes through the ceremony of marriage with an animal or plant, the evil spirit will mistake it for her real husband and kill it. Then there will be no curse to prevent her from living as long as she likes with her subsequent real husband.

Speeding the Golf Ball

The first golf balls were not rough, but it was found by experiment that if a golf ball is made rough it flies farther and straighter than if perfectly smooth. Why this should be so is difficult to explain. Probably the roughened ball has more elasticity when struck by the club, and it seems certain, too, that the roughening of the ball makes it revolve like a rifle bullet, and thus gives it a straighter path, with more penetrating power.

Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the State of Minnesota

Submitted by the Legislature at its General Session, 1931, to the People of Minnesota at the General 1932 Election Together with Statements of

Purpose and Effect of each

Prepared by
HENRY N. BENSON
Attorney-General of Minnesota

Addressed to MIKE HOLM
Secretary of State

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
LEGAL DEPARTMENT.
HENRY N. BENSON,
Attorney General.

HON. MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of State.

Pursuant to Mason's Minnesota Statutes of 1927, section 46, I herewith transmit a statement of the purposes and effect of the proposed amendments to the constitution of the state of Minnesota which are to be submitted to the electors of the state at the 1932 general election, in accordance with certain acts adopted by the legislature at the 1931 session thereof.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 1

By the adoption of Laws 1931, chapter 420, the legislature has proposed an amendment to article 9, section 1, of the constitution, relating to taxation. This section now reads as follows:

"The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected for public purposes, but public burying grounds, public school houses, public hospitals, academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning, all churches, church property and houses of worship, institutions of purely public charity, and public property used exclusively for any public purpose, shall be exempt from taxation, and there may be exempted from taxation personal property not exceeding in value $200, for each household, individual or head of a family, as the legislature may determine: Provided, that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation, and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, modify or repeal any existing law providing for the taxation of the gross earnings of railroads."

If amended as proposed, this section will read as follows:

"The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected for public purposes, but public burying grounds, public school houses, public hospitals, academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning, all churches, church property and houses of worship, institutions of purely public charity, and public property used exclusively for any public purpose, shall be exempt from taxation, and there may be exempted from taxation personal property not exceeding in value $200, for each household, individual or head of the family, as the legislature may determine. The legislature may enact any law required to make the taxation of national banking associations conform to the laws of the United States. Taxes may be imposed upon incomes and on franchises and privileges measured by income, including income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies, which may be classified, and which taxes may be graduated and progressive, and the legislature may prescribe reasonable exemptions, and such taxes may be in lieu, in whole or in part, of taxes on any class or classes of real or personal property as the legislature may determine. It shall not be necessary to submit to a vote of the people any law imposing a tax upon the income, franchises or privileges of railroad companies. Any and all provisions of the constitution of this State inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed. Provided, that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation, and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, modify or repeal any existing law providing for the taxation of the gross earnings of railroads."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment

The proposed amendment is intended, first, to give the legislature specific authority to enact such laws respecting the taxation of national banking associations as will conform to the laws of the United States. The laws of the United States at present provide in substance that the states may tax the shares of a national banking association, provided that the rate of tax on such shares shall not be greater than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such state coming in competition with the business of national banks. At present the laws of Minnesota provide that shares of such a banking association shall be assessed at thirty-three and one-third per cent (33 1/3%) of their true and full value. Moneys and credits and mortgages upon and executory contracts for the sale of real estate are taxed in this state at a lower rate. The supreme court of the United States has held that the Minnesota plan of taxing shares of a national banking association is invalid because these shares are taxed at a higher rate than moneys and credits and mortgages on and executory contracts for the sale of real estate. Under the proposed amendment it is intended to give the legislature the power to enact laws for the taxation of national banks that shall be in harmony with the federal statutes on that subject, even though such laws might offend other provisions of the state constitution.

The remainder of the new matter which would be placed in said section 1 by the proposed amendment is intended to give the legislature specific authority to enact laws providing for a tax on incomes, and on franchises and privileges measured by income, including income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies. It is proposed that all incomes may be classified and that taxes may be graduated and progressive; that is to say, the rates may be different on incomes of different sizes. It is intended that the legislature shall have power to allow reasonable exemptions from such taxes and to provide that such income taxes may be in lieu, either in whole or in part, of taxes on such other classes of real or personal property as it may determine. It is proposed that any law imposing a tax upon the income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies need not be submitted to a vote of the people, as now provided by article 4, section 32a of the constitution.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The proposed amendment, if adopted, will have the following effect:

1. The legislature will have specific authority to make the laws of this state relating to taxation of national banking associations conform to the laws of the United States, notwithstanding any other provision of the state constitution.

2. The legislature will have specific authority to adopt a graduated and progressive income tax law, including a tax on franchises and privileges, as measured by income, and on the income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies. The legislature may allow reasonable exemptions and may provide that the income tax shall be in lieu, in whole or in part, of taxes on certain classes of real or personal property. Such laws taxing the income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies will not be subject to a vote of the people as provided by article 4, section 32a, of the constitution.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

First:
TAXATION OF INCOME AND NATIONAL BANKS.

Amendment to section 1, article 9, of the constitution of the State of Minnesota, relating to taxation, to authorize the imposing of taxes on incomes, and on franchises and privileges, including income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies, measured by income, which taxes may be classified, and may be graduated and progressive and providing for exemptions therefrom, and that such taxes may be in lieu, in whole or in part, of other taxes on real or personal property. It shall not be necessary to submit to a vote of the people any law imposing a tax upon the income, franchises or privileges of railroad companies. The legislature may enact any law required to make the taxation of national banking associations conform to the laws of the United States.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 2.

By the adoption of Laws 1931, chapter 418, the legislature has proposed an amendment to article 16, section 3, of the constitution, relating to taxation of motor vehicles. Said section now reads as follows:

"The legislature is hereby authorized to provide, by law, for the taxation of motor vehicles, using the public streets and highways of this state, on a more onerous basis than other personal property; provided, however, that any such tax on motor vehicles shall be in lieu of all other taxes thereon, except wheelage taxes, so-called, which may be imposed by any borough, city or village. Any such law may, in the discretion of the legislature, provide for the exemption from taxation of any motor vehicle owned by a nonresident of the state, and transiently or temporarily using the streets and highways of the state. The proceeds of such tax shall be paid in to said trunk highway sinking fund."

If the proposed amendment is adopted, this section will read as follows:

"The legislature is hereby authorized to provide, by law, for the taxation of motor vehicles, using the public streets and highways of this state, on a more onerous basis than other personal property; provided, however, that any such tax on motor vehicles shall be in lieu of all other taxes thereon, except wheelage taxes, so-called, which may be imposed by any borough, city or village, and except that the legislature may impose such tax upon motor vehicles of companies paying taxes under gross earnings system of taxation and upon the right to use such vehicles upon the public highways notwithstanding the fact that earnings from such vehicles may be included in the earnings of such companies upon which such gross earnings taxes are computed. Any such law may, in the discretion of the legislature, provide for the exemption from taxation of any motor vehicle owned by a nonresident of the state, and transiently or temporarily using the streets and highways of the state. The proceeds of such tax shall be paid in to said trunk highway sinking fund."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment

Under our present laws certain corporations, associations and individuals pay taxes to the state based on their gross earnings. Our supreme court has held that corporations, associations and individuals paying a gross earnings tax in the operation of their business in lieu of other taxes are not subject to payment of taxes on their motor vehicles operated on the highways of the state. It is intended by this amendment to authorize the legislature to make such vehicles subject to the motor vehicle tax, notwithstanding the payment by the owners of a gross earnings tax.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The effect of the proposed amendment to article 16, section 3, will be to permit the legislature to impose the same tax on motor vehicles using our public highways and owned by a corporation, association or individual paying a gross earnings tax as is imposed on other motor vehicles.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

Second:
TAXATION OF CERTAIN MOTOR VEHICLES.

Amendment of article 16, section 3, of the constitution, relating to the taxation of motor vehicles of companies paying taxes under the gross earnings system of taxation.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 3.

By the adoption of Laws 1931, chapter 417, the legislature has proposed an amendment to article 8 of the constitution by adding thereto a new section, to be known as section 8, to read as follows:

"Any of the public lands of the state, including lands held in trust for any purpose, may, with the approval of a commission consisting of the governor, the attorney general and the state auditor, be exchanged for lands of the United States as the legislature may provide, and the lands so acquired shall be subject to the trust, if any, to which the lands exchanged therefor were subject, and the state shall reserve all mineral and water and water power rights in lands so transferred by the state."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment

By article 8, section 2, of the constitution, school and swamp lands owned by the state may not be disposed of other than at public sale. The purpose of the proposed amendment is to abrogate this requirement, in so far as the disposal of such lands to the federal government is concerned, by authorizing the legislature to provide, with the approval of a commission consisting of the governor, the attorney general and the state auditor, for the exchange with the United States of such state lands in return for lands owned by the federal government, the state specifically reserving all mineral and water and water power rights in lands so transferred, and the lands so acquired being subject to the trust, if any, to which the lands exchanged therefor were subject.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The effect of the proposed amendment, if adopted, will be to abrogate the constitutional requirement that school and swamp lands be disposed of only by public sale and will permit the legislature to authorize the exchange of such lands for lands of the United States, with the approval of a commission consisting of the governor, the attorney general and the state auditor. All mineral and water and water power rights in lands so transferred are reserved to the state. The proceeds of sales of federal lands so acquired by exchange would be subject, under the proposed amendment, to the same trusts as the state lands which were conveyed.

The ballots used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

Third:
EXCHANGE OF STATE AND FEDERAL LANDS.

Amendment of article 8 of the constitution, authorizing the exchange of public lands of the state for lands of the United States, as the legislature may provide.

YES ....

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 4.

By the adoption of Laws 1931, chapter 419, the legislature has proposed and amendment to article 9, section 10, of the constitution. This section now reads as follows:

"The credit of the state shall never be given or loaned in aid of any individual, association or corporation, except as hereinafter provided. Nor shall there be any further issue of bonds denominated 'Minnesota State Railroad Bonds', under what purports to be an amendment to section ten (10) of article nine (9) of the Constitution, adopted April 15th, 1858, which is hereby expunged from the Constitution, saving, excepting and reserving to the state, nevertheless, all rights, remedies and forfeitures accruing under said amendment. Provided, however, that for the purpose of developing the agricultural resources of the state, the state may establish and maintain a system of rural credits and thereby loan money and extend credit to the people of the state upon real estate security in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by law, and to issue and negotiate bonds to provide money to be so loaned. The limit of indebtedness contained in section 5 of this article shall not apply to the provisions of this section, and the purposes for which the credit of the state or the aforesaid municipal subdivisions thereof may be given or loaned as herein provided are declared to be public purposes."

If the proposed amendment is adopted, the section will read as follows:

"The credit of the state shall never be given or loaned in aid of any individual, association or corporation, except as hereinafter provided. Nor shall there be any further issue of bonds denominated 'Minnesota State Railroad Bonds', under what purports to be an amendment to section ten (10) of article nine (9) of the Constitution, adopted April 15, 1858, which is hereby expunged from the Constitution, saving, excepting and reserving to the state, nevertheless, all rights, remedies and forfeitures accruing under said amendment. Provided, however, that for the purpose of developing the agricultural resources of the state, the state may establish and maintain a system of rural credits and thereby loan money and extend credit to the people of the state upon real estate security in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by law, and to issue and negotiate bonds to provide money to be so loaned. The limit of indebtedness contained in section 5 of this article shall not apply to the provisions of this section, and the purposes for which the credit of the state or the aforesaid municipal subdivisions thereof may be given or loaned as herein provided are declared to be public purposes.

"The legislature may authorize the taxing of any lands, title to which is acquired by the state through the operation of such system of rural credits, during the period such lands are held by the state, and for the assessment thereof for benefits arising from improvements, and may provide for the payment of such taxes and assessments out of the funds arising from the sale of such bonds or the operation of such system of rural credits. In lieu of such taxation the legislature may appropriate out of such funds without discrimination to all the school districts, towns, counties, cities, villages and boroughs in which such lands are located sums of money not exceeding the amounts which would have been realized by such governmental subdivisions from the assessments against or taxation of such lands if privately owned."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment

By reason of the operation of the Department of Rural Credit the state of Minnesota has acquired title to a large amount of improved farm lands. Property owned by the state is not subject to taxation. The purpose of this proposed amendment is to give the legislature constitutional authority to subject lands acquired through the operation of the system of rural credits to taxation and the payment of assessments for improvements; and to provide that such taxes and assessments be paid out of funds arising from the sale of bonds or the operation of such system of rural credits. It is further intended to permit the legislature to appropriate out of such funds, without discrimination, to all the school districts, towns, counties, cities, villages and boroughs of the state in which such lands are located, sums of money not exceeding the amounts which would have been realized by such governmental subdivisions from the assessments against or taxation of such lands if privately owned.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment

If adopted, the proposed amendment will enable the legislature, in its discretion, to subject real estate acquired by the state through the operation of the system of rural credits to taxation and the payment of assessments, the same as lands privately owned. The legislature may provide that such taxes and assessments be paid from the rural credit funds, or it may appropriate from such funds to the school districts, towns, counties, cities, villages and boroughs of the state in which such lands are located, without discrimination, an amount not exceeding what would have been realized by these governmental subdivisions from assessments against or taxation of such lands if privately owned.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

Fourth:
TAXATION OF RURAL CREDITS LANDS

Amendment to section 10 of article 9 of the constitution of the State of Minnesota, to authorize the taxing of lands acquired by the state through the operation of the system of rural credits and the appropriation of moneys from the funds of the Department of Rural Credits.

Minn. Counties Ask R. F. C. Aid

A request for $660,506 for direct relief work in 20 Minnesota counties up to January 1, was made to the Reconstruction Finance corporation Monday by Governor Olson.

Professor Morris B. Lambie of the University of Minnesota, who was placed in charge of preparing the requests of the counties, and Mrs. Blanche Ladu chairman of the state board of control, were in Washington ready to back up the demands at a conference with the Reconstruction corporation officials.

Three of the counties asked for loans, and the remainder outright arpropriations for relief work. The requests of the 20 counties totalled $811,975 which was pared down to only $660,506.

The largest request of the 20 submitted by Governor Olson is $271,626 for St. Louis county. This county originally requested $302,118. Ramsey county requests $140,072. The following county amounts were recommended: Aitkin, $9,570; Lake of the Woods, $9,095; Beltrami, $14,660; Mahnomen, $9,225; Norman, $9,640 and Marshall, $3,750.

Preserve Partly Closed

Hunting and trapping of all kinds will be prohibited over a large area of the Red Lake game preserve as a conservation measure starting Nov. 1, according to a notice received from W. T. Cox, state conservation commissioner.

The area of the game preserve that will be closed to hunters has for its eastern boundary Highway No. 72 from the north shore of Red Lake to a point 15 miles north and will extend west for a distance of thirty miles with Red Lake and the Indian reservation for its south boundary.

The section of the game refuge closed to hunters and trappers is the center of the bog country that extends north of Red Lake and has been set aside by the commissioner as a breeding ground for caribou, moose, deer, beaver, partridges, migratory game birds and all other kinds of wild life.

Part of the southern boundary of the game preserve where it coincides with the north line of the Red Lake Indian reservation is now being marked by the cutting of a strip of timber on a line being surveyed by E. J. Bourgeois of Bemidji.

Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Knutson and family of Cottenwood, Minn. motored up here on Saturday for an over Sunday visit at the F. K. Fredrickson home.

Mr. and Mrs. Erick Soderberg of Pontiac, Michigan arrived here on Tuesday evening to visit for a few weeks at the home of Mrs. Soderberg's parents, Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Sandberg.

C. A. Larson and family who have been making their home in the depot since they moved here last spring, have rented the Clarence Erickson house recently vacated by the Haukeness family and, moved in there on Tuesday.

P. B. Malberg, prominent farmer in Excell Township and Judge of Probate B. B. Brett, of Warren are the first candidates so far to call your attention to the coming general election.

Christmas Seals

Supt. E. O. Nybakken has been appointed Local Manager for the 1932 Christmas Seal Sale in Holt, according to an announcement received yesterday from the Minnesota Public Health Association, which directs the Sale in the State. The sale will open Thanksgiving Day.

The double-barred cross seals support health and anti-tuberculosis activities in each county, and help finance the state and national organized campaign to wipe out the White Plague.

This year the people of Minnesota will join with the world in observing the 50th anniversary of the discovery of the tuberculosis germ by Dr. Robert Koch of Germany. In 1882, when the cause of tuberculosis was discovered, the world accepted the White Plague as a hopeless scourge of mankind, the State Association points out. Today, through the educational work of Christmas Seals, people everywhere know it is a preventable and curable desease, and many thousands of lives are saved each year.

Battle for World Trade Tightens Up

Tried and New Methods in Redoubled Efforts.

Washington.—"The series of trade agreements between Great Britain and her dominions and colonies recently reached at the conference in Ottawa, Canada, probably will bring about far-reaching alterations in the existing world 'trade pattern,'" says a bulletin from the National Geographic society. "The raising of new barriers is sure to result in redoubled efforts by the great industrial nations outside the British empire to increase their world trade, both by tried methods and new ones.

United States Commercial Attaches.

"Heretofore," continues the bulletin, "the leading exporting nations of the New and Old world have gone about the matter of drumming up trade in ways characteristically their own. With its staff of trade experts at home in the Department of Commerce, its commercial attaches and trade commissioners in 59 foreign ports and industrial centers, and its even larger group of consular agents scattered around the world, the United States seeks to keep its finger on the pulse of world trade and to assist American manufacturers and exporters to find new markets and to make better use of old ones.

"Great Britain has always placed chief reliance officially on her army of consuls who are to be found wherever any considerable stream of goods rises to flow into the great currents of world trade. Aside from this official body of agents, a veritable army of salesmen beats its way up and down the world seeking to satisfy whatever need arises with British goods.

"France, to a large extent, has specialized in striving for world trade, by placing emphasis on her artistic products and by building up the idea of Paris as a world art center. This is especially true of fashions, perfumes and jewelry.

Relies on Trade Fairs.

"Germany maintains the usual staff of consuls in foreign commercial centers, but places chief reliance, in the struggle for world trade, on her great international exchanges or trade fairs, such as that at Leipzig.

"Sweden, not to be outdone by other nations, pursues a well organized plan to obtain its share of world trade. The great industries of the country have banded together in an exporters' association, which operates under governmental sanction to stimulate Swedish exports, and maintains agents in foreign countries.

"Belgium relies in many cases on honorary consuls. But at home the Belgian government has taken very definite steps to help export trade. An export credit committee has been set up with authority to grant a governmental guarantee, up to a total amount of 600,000,000 francs, for payments for the sale abroad of Belgian goods and goods from Belgium's colonies. In addition there is in Belgium a national industrial credit society which similarly aids in financing sales to foreign countries."

500-Year-Old Oak May Not Survive the Winter

Natick, Mass.—The John Eliot oak, whose age horticulturists estimate as high as 500 years, will not survive the rigors of another winter, Natick natives fear.

It was under this tree, during the middle of the Seventeenth century, that John Eliot ministered to the Indians, whom he believed to be the descendants of the lost tribes of Israel.

And it was this same tree, last century, that inspired Longfellow to pen the poem beginning, "Thou ancient oak! whose myriad leaves are loud with sounds of unintelligible speech."

Killed by leaking gas fumes that enveloped its gnarled roots five years ago, the old oak has continued to stand, though only four stubby limbs spread out from its almost barkless trunk today, and those who have watched it down through the years fear another winter will see the remains of the landmark forever removed.

Men Now Having Faces Lifted to Save Jobs

Detroit, Mich.—A large number of men submit to esthetic or facial surgery to improve their chances in the industrial world, according to Dr. Suzanne Noel, Paris surgeon, who stopped off here on a world tour sponsored by the French government.

In fact one out of every three of her patients is a man seeking to improve on nature by having his face lifted, Doctor Noel said.

In her twenty years of practice Doctor Noel has performed 6,000 esthetic operations, mostly on those whom age threatens to dismiss from the industrial world.

Freak Ground Squirrel Sans Eyes, Ears, Caught

Hollister, Calif.—A ground squirrel with neither eyes nor ears has been trapped by eleven-year-old John Edward Menez on his father's ranch near here. Upon casual observation it appeared to have no head, but when closely examined it was seen to have a normal mouth and nose, apparently a part of its stubby neck. The remainder of the body was normal.

New Device Tells When to Pick Pears

Portland, Ore.—A new electrical device to test the maturity of pears is expected to prove an important development in picking Oregon's important crop.

The new tester is much more accurate than the pressure tester now in use, according to James G. Moore, assistant horticulturist of the state college experiment station.

Radio Appeal for Lost Dog Brings Oversupply

Pasadena, Calif.—When Flash, a police dog belonging to Tommy, four-year-old son of D. R. Hamilton, police broadcaster, disappeared, Tommy was seriously ill. The father broadcast a plea for the return of the dog. It rained "cats and dogs." In 24 hours 179 persons telephoned they had seen Flash, and 20 pet owners led their canines to Hamilton's office offering to lend them until broken-hearted Tommy recovered.

Mountains Are Ice

Reykjavik, Iceland.—The "mountains" of Greenland are really a vast glacier range, according to Dr. Lauge Koch, leader of a Danish expedition to the island.

RECLUSE USES COFFIN AS DINNER TABLE

Perrin, Texas.—Far from the roar of his native Paris, the giant hermit of the Jacks county hills sits beside the coffin in which he is to be buried—waiting for death.

The coffin, covered with a cloth, daily serves Albert Schnocke as a dining table in his remote little shack, away from the world. Eight years ago he drove into town with a neighboring rancher and out of his life's savings bought the black satin casket with the silver handles and the top plate with the engraved words "At Rest."

Schnocke passed his ninetieth birthday recently—an event he celebrated by eating a self-prepared dinner, served on the coffin.

Little is known of this strange recluse, who began a hermit's life beyond the memory of only the oldest inhabitants. He cannot hear and he speaks in barely more than monosyllables. From his fragmentary conversation a little of his life was learned.

Schnocke was born in Paris, France, in 1842. He left France in his youth to seek adventure in America. He joined the Union forces in the Civil war and was mustered out of service at old Fort Richardson, at Jacksboro, Texas.

Schnocke bought a few acres of land here and built a small hut. He fashioned his clothes from sacks and lived off the herbs and wild life of the hills. Such were the tales that pictured him as a "wild man" that only the bravest neighbors went near his cabin.

Old settlers' folklore describe him as having killed more Comanche Indians during the early Indian wars than any white man.

What caused Schnocke to lead the life of a hermit, he alone knows. He never married and has no known relatives. His pastime is reading and his favorite work is Balzac's "A Bachelor's Establishment."

On rare occasions when visitors call he unscrews the lid of the coffin, shows them the casket and with his shirtsleeve shines the plate with the engraved words "At Rest."

MOST PERFECT ROBOT

The most perfect robot in the world is claimed by a young English scientist, who, after 14 years of labor and at a cost of nearly $18,000, has at last completed a mechanical man which is almost human. This amazing robot can talk, sing, whistle, laugh or carry on a conversation (for a half hour at a time), tell the time and the day, fire a revolver and read the small print of a newspaper.

Clock-Roosting Pigeons Slow Up Town's Time

Robinson, Ill.—Pigeons must "bide their time" before roosting on the courthouse clock here.

Sheriff John Keller doesn't object to the birds resting on the four-foot minute hand when it is going "downhill," between the hours of 12 and 6.

But on the "uphill drag," between 6 and 12, their roosting slows up the giant timepiece and the pigeons are going to get a bullet instead of a nap, the sheriff threatened.

Holland Boy Requests Pennsylvania Auto Tag

Harrisburg, Pa.—A Pennsylvania automobile license tag was dispatched to Holland by the state department of revenue to aid the collection of a boy in Utrecht. The young collector asked the Pennsylvania department to send a tag to represent the United States in his collection. He promised to reciprocate by sending a Dutch registration tag to the department.

Fence 20 Miles Long

Kingsville, Texas.—A fence 20 miles long, without a turn or bend, has been completed. It is one of the boundaries of the King ranch. Barbed wire of the earlier days has given way to heavy smooth wire which cannot injure cattle.

TALES OF THE CHIEFS

By Editha L. Watson

RED CLOUD

Red Cloud

Eighty coups! (A coup is a deed of bravery in battle, and often was attended by great risk.)

It certainly was no common Indian warrior who counted so many. This was a self-made man, and one who made a good job of it. He rose to chieftainship through his ability as a statesman; he led his people in battle because of his generalship. The scarlet blankets of his warriors covered the hillsides like a cloud—and from this fact he gained the name we know him by—Red Cloud.

Such a man could not be lightly brushed aside when he had business on foot, as the white men discovered. Buffalo range was growing scarce, and the Oglalas had but one really good hunting ground remaining. Through this territory it was proposed to build a railroad from Ft. Laramie, Wyo., to the gold lands in Montana, by way of Powder river.

Red Cloud opposed this railroad. Travel through the buffalo range would destroy its value and work hardship on the tribe. The Oglala agreed with their chief, and he made ready to act.

As the first move, the government sent out a small detachment of troops to start construction work. The Oglala, strengthened by some Cheyenne warriors, stopped them, and kept them under surveillance so that they could not continue. After several weeks, however, the young, hot-blooded Indians threatened harm to their captives, and Red Cloud let them proceed. This was move number two.

The government's turn was taken by commissioners, who came to the Oglala with requests that they allow the road to be built. Red Cloud would not attend the council, but forbade his people to negotiate.

It was necessary for the government to make a stronger move. Another council was called. Red Cloud was there, this time, and spoke against endangering the hunting grounds. While he was speaking, however, a large number of troops came up, saying that they had been ordered to open the way to Montana. At this, the Oglala chief withdrew his people from the council, defiant.

It looked as if the soldiers had won the game. Work was started and forts were built. Protests from the Indians fell on deaf ears. It was Red Cloud's time to move—if he could—and he decided to try an effective one.

Two thousand warriors surrounded the force at Fort Kearny. They constantly harassed the besieged men, who did not even dare to go out for meat, though game was plentiful and near. A load of hay for the horses in the fort must be taken from the prairie under escort. No wagon could pass over the road, and work was completely stopped. Two severe battles took place, also, in one of which an entire detachment of 81 men was killed.

Red Cloud had won! There was nothing to do but come to terms, which the powerful chief named: the limits of the Sioux country must be defined; the posts must be abandoned, and the road also; the garrisons must be withdrawn. Red Cloud declined even to appear until the soldiers had gone, when he signed the treaty November 6, 1868. This game of red against white had taken more than two years to play.

Once committed to peace, Red Cloud lived up to his promises. He was still not in favor of civilization, but his resistance to it was not backed by force. On account of his well-known prejudices, it was thought by many that he secretly favored the uprising of 1876, but it is certain that he did not aid the hostile Sioux, for Red Cloud was a man of his word, and had sworn friendship to the whites. Also, in a later outbreak, his neutral attitude brought him in danger from his own race, who resented his loyalty to the United States. But a man who had counted 80 coups in the prime of his life, did not fear threats.

He was an old man now, and his eyesight was failing. He knew that the venomous outbreaks of the Sioux were but prolonging trouble, and that the sooner they submitted to their fate, the better. This, too, was the counsel of the other old men to the warriors, but the pugnacious young fighters held out as long as they could.

Col. Charles W. Taylor tells the story of Red Cloud's visit to him at this time. The old chief still had power over his people, and he kept them from joining in the fight, while he did all he could to terminate it. One cold, wet night, he eluded his tribesmen and came to Colonel Taylor's camp. Here he discussed the situation and told his belief that a surrender was imminent. This proved to be true, and the hostile Sioux gave up and came to the agency shortly afterward. The man who had outwitted General Carrington's troops more than 20 years previously, knew that the outcome of this war would be different.

He died December 10, 1909, at the age of eighty-seven. Mooney declares that he was "probably the most famous and powerful chief in the history of the tribe."

REPORT CARDS

As we know this is our first six weeks of school and report cards will soon be out. The main question is, "How do I stand?" If we have all A's every thing's O. K. but if not I'd like to know the reason. I wonder why it is that some can get such very big marks while others are a complete failure. Is it because of inheritance or lack of study? Remember the saying. "Success is 99 per cent. perspiration and 1 per cent. inspiration." Therefore I think that all of us who have a high grade should continue to meet it and all of us who have a low grade should make a resolution to do better and raise our marks.

GRADES I and II

The following children had 100 in Spelling on Friday:

Lillian, Ruth, Ruby, Roy, Wayne, Elaine.

The honor roll for this six weeks is as follows:

Grade I
  Luella Fluke
Grade II
  Ruby Halvorson
  Ruth Halvorson
  Roy Johnson

The children have been working on a farm which is now almost completed. They have made a house, barn, silo, hen house, pig pen, and garage. They also made some of the pigs, cows, and poultry for it from clay.

Last week we studied on what mother does in preparing for winter. We decided we would also like to can some fruit. We canned two and a half quarts of apples which we had great fun eating the day Eloise left for Mud Lake.

GRADES III, IV and V

Honor Roll:

Third Grade
  Leroy Frederickson
  Russell Sanoden
  Lois Hanson
Fourth Grade
  Lorene Fluke
  Francis Johnson
Fifth Grade
  Vernice Tollefsrud

The third grade is working on an Indian project. They have completed their Indian bowls.

The third and fourth grades have new progress books in English.

Francis Johnson has left our school and is going to school out in the country.

Eleanor and Sylvia Haukeness have moved to Canada.

GRADES VI, VII and VIII

Trade In Your Worn Tires for Safe Gripping Non-Skid Firestone Tires

LIBERAL trade-in allowance—now—on all Firestone High Speed and Heavy Duty Tires!

Why take a chance on worn, smooth, uncertain tires when you can buy Firestone non-skid safe, proven tires at lowest prices.

Firestone Tires are designed to grip the road. The non-skid tread is thick, tough and gives 25% longer non-skid safety.

Glen Schultz only last month set a new world's record in climbing Pike's Peak, in 16 min. 47 sec. His top speed was 78 miles per hour—negotiating many hair-raising turns where a skid or a tire failure meant death.

The Firestone tread is designed with angles and projections to give the maximum traction and non-skid. Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires hold all world records on road and track for Safety—Speed—Mileage and Endurance.

It's that kind of stamina that makes Firestone Tires safe and economical for you.

That's why race drivers use Firestone Tires. They won't risk their lives on any other make.

No tire in the world has the Firestone endurance. That is because Gum-Dipping, the patented Firestone process, transforms the cotton cords into tough, sinewy units. It means that the liquid rubber penetrates every cord and coats every fiber, assuring protection against internal heat. Two Extra Gum-Dipped Cord Plies under the Tread, give 56% stronger bond between tread and cord body.

Don't buy cheap tires that are only made to sell. Don't risk your life on wet, slippery pavements these October days—Use the same precaution race drivers use. Trade in your old tires—We will give you a liberal allowance on Firestone Tires—the safest tires in the world.

The Black Box of Silence

CHAPTER I

—1—

The Black Box

It was between the acts of the play. The orchestra of a theater in Carthage, a college town of the Middle West, was in full swing, when there sounded a faint click from what appeared to be an overgrown portable camera on the lap of one of two young men seated in the right hand proscenium box of the theater, and instantly the bowing of the violins, the 'cellos and the bass, the fingering of the brass and woodwind, the tapping of the padded sticks on the kettle-drums became merely so many soundless gestures in a pantomime. All was dead silence.

The two young men in the box who seemed to have precipitated this extraordinary state of affairs were both about of an age, both Carthage born and reared, and both graduates of the local college. But with these basic particulars the similarities paused abruptly. Owen Landis, the one with the queer black box on his knees, was slenderly built, with a thin, eager face and dark hair and eyes—the eyes of a dreamer and enthusiast. His companion, Walter Markham, was the young-man-about-town of a small city; well-dressed, well-fed, yet not without a glimmer of penetrative shrewdness in his eyes to prove his right to claim kinship with his hard-headed banker father.

For an interval measurable in seconds the soundless pantomime continued; then, suddenly, and as if there had been no gap of silence, the various instruments burst into full voice. A wave of half bewilderment swept over the house, followed quickly by enthusiastic applause, the audience evidently taking the pantomimic interruption for a skillful bit of stage business on the part of the orchestra.

"Wonderful!" Markham exclaimed, under cover of the resumed music. "As you said, Owen, it has to be seen to be believed. Why didn't you keep it up a bit longer?"

Landis shook his head. "I didn't dare to let it go on. In two seconds more there would have been a panic. I figured that for just about so long Schomberg's men would go on bowing and fingering automatically—as they did. But when realization came, there'd be chaos. I meant to anticipate that moment, and I did; couldn't let it go over the brink, you know."

"Black magic!" Markham commented. "Is this what you've been working on all these months that you've been holed up in your laboratory den?"

"You've said it."

"Well, now you've got it, what's the answer? I mean, how does it do it?"

"As I've told you, it is simple enough in principle. By radio we transmit sound and make it do our bidding. My problem was to find a circuit which, instead of amplifying the received sounds would itself operate to neutralize them. Once my basic circuit was developed, all it asked for was a pretty long series of experiments."

"Now you've found the answer to your problem, what are you going to do with it?"

"Come around to my shop with me after the play and I'll talk it out with you," Landis said, adding "Most inventors and discoverers are short on practical sense—common sense—and I'm no exception. Maybe you can supply what I'm lacking in that respect."

Two hours later the two young men were seated in Landis' workshop laboratory. On the walk from the theater Landis had tried to explain, as untechnically as he could, the successive steps taken in the development of his astonishing invention.

"What you've been saying is mostly Greek to me," Markham offered. "Just the same, I can surround the fact accomplished, all right—having had the practical demonstration. But now the question arises, what have you got? Can it be put to any useful use?"

"Possibilities?" Landis queried. "They are almost unlimited. The trouble is that they are bad as well as good."

"Shoot," said the son of small-city wealth, "I'm listening."

"The circuit, or whatever you choose to call it, will operate at a distance—I don't know just yet how far—and it will pass either through or around obstructions. Turn a switch, and you can sleep in silence as profound as that of a mountain top, so far as noises are concerned."

"Huh! sounds a good bit like Alice in Wonderland. But what else? If you stop the racket for yourself, you stop it for everybody else, as well, don't you?"

"At short distances, as tonight in the theater, yes. Take, for example, a steam whistle a mile away; in the immediate neighborhood of the whistle the sound is normal, or nearly so; a listener within a radius of, say, a quarter of a mile would scarcely detect any muting of the blast, though it is really muted at its source. Beyond this inner circle the sound diminishes quite rapidly until at about half a mile it has vanished completely."

"In your demonstration tonight you connected the thing with the theater lighting circuit. Does that mean that you are tied to electric power plants for its use?"

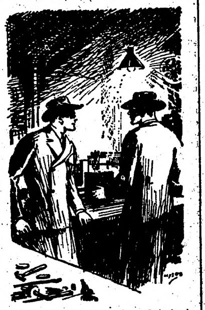
"Not at all. An automobile storage battery will operate the box for a limited time."

Markham nodded slowly. "Don't you know, Owen, it all listens a good bit like a pipe dream."

"So it does to me. But what is worse, I can't get away from the feeling that I'm in the fix of the man who invented the Frankenstein thing."

"Meaning—?"

"Meaning the frightful uses to which this contrivance of mine could be put in the committing of crime. You might say there is no end to them. Noise is the burglar's chief menace; with this box of mine coupled to a lighting socket he could wreck the lower story of a house or blow the strongest bank vault in perfect security, so far as the noise was concerned. So, also, with the use of firearms. You see what I mean. In the possession of a criminal there is simply no limit to the harm the thing might do."



"In the Possession of a Criminal There Is Simply No Limit to the Harm the Thing Might Do."

"How many people know about your invention, Owen?"

"Up to this minute, just two of us—you and myself. I haven't talked about it to anybody, partly because the whole thing was experimental and I didn't want to have to answer a lot of curious questions. But now, as I've said, I'm like the man who invented the Frankenstein thing in Mrs. Shelley's story. When I think of all the harm it might do in the wrong hands, I feel as if I ought to tie a stone to the box and pitch it into the river."

There was a thoughtful pause, and at the end of it, Markham said, "You are quite sure nobody else knows about it?"

"I hope I am."

"Have you any reason to doubt it?"

"Not what you could call a reason; no. But I have worked here in the lab, a good many nights, sometimes until quite late, and there have been moments when I've had a queer feeling that I wasn't alone; that somebody was spying on me. Pure auto-suggestion, I guess."

Markham nodded. "We'll let that part of it rest and pass on to the material things. You want to make some money out of this invention of yours, don't you? Or are you too much of an inventor to look that far ahead?"

Landis smiled. "I'm not quite so much of a dreamer as that, Wally. If I could only be sure the thing wouldn't be put to evil uses—"

"You'd like to see some hard cash results," Markham finished for him. "That is right and proper—and human."

"I suppose so; while I was at work on it I did think that if it should prove a success it might help me find a place as a research man with one of the big electric companies."

"Too modest, as you usually are," grunted Markham. "There's a frilly fortune in that box if it's properly exploited. But to make money out of an invention you have to spend money. Suppose you let me talk to dad—in strict confidence, of course."

"You'd do that for me?"

"Sure I would. Why not?"

There was a moment of silent embarrassment, and then Landis said, half apologetically, "Give me a day or so to think about it, Wally. I want to see if I can't fight down that feeling about the criminal possibilities. It's fearfully good of you to offer to step in and I—"

Markham cut the protests short.

"Take as much time as you want, of course. And never mind the acknowledgments. We've been pretty chummy for a good many years, you and I, Owen, and it would be a pity if either of us wouldn't give the other a hand when the chance offered." Then, with a glance at his watch. "If it wasn't so late I'd stay a bit longer and rawhide you about another matter. But I guess the other matter will keep."

"It isn't late for me. What have I been doing that I ought not to have done?"

"I was watching you tonight when Betty Lawson was on the stage. I guess you know good and well what I saw?"

Landis flushed boyishly and looked down.

"You didn't see anything more than you have known for a good while."

Markham laughed. "Nothing more than all Carthage has known, for that matter. But, say, boy—what do you think a girl is made of? For a half-year and better you've buried yourself in this work shack of yours, and if you've thought anything at all about Betty, you've taken it out in thinking. What social pleasure she's enjoyed she's had to forage for in other directions—the amateur theatrical movements, for instance. I've chased her about a little—not nearly so much as I wanted to—but you've simply ignored her, Owen; you know you have."

The laggard in love spoke up quickly.

"You are not saying it all, Wally—not speaking for yourself, I mean. But you don't need to. I've known ever since last year how it is with you. You are in love with Betty yourself. That is one reason why I've buried myself in my job here—to give you and her a chance to find out where you both stand. No, don't make any mistake; it isn't any silly knightly chivalry on my part—just common decency. If I should marry, I'm not even sure I could feed and clothe a wife. And when poverty comes in at the door—"

"Oh, shush! You needn't quote proverbs at me. Don't you suppose I know that I don't stand a Chinaman's chance with Betty? What I'm beefing about is the way you scamp your chances with her. There's another Richmond in the field. Did you know that?"

Landis' face fell.

"No! You don't mean that, Wally!"

"I do, indeed; this new fellow, Canby, who is cutting such a wide swath with his wonderful development scheme for Carthage. Going to make it another Chicago overnight and all that. He is rushing Betty to a finish, and she seems to like it."

A gridironing of fine lines appeared between Landis' eyes.

"I don't like Canby, Wally—what little I've seen of him."

"Just the same, he is exactly the kind of brute to take a girl's fancy; good-looking, dashing, man-of-the-bigger-world; that sort. Betty is plenty sensible, but at the same time she is human. There; I've said my say, and now I'll toddle along. What do you do with this priceless casket of yours overnight—take it to bed with you?"

"Not quite that; I keep it here." Landis knelt before a small safe under the laboratory work bench, opened it, put the black box inside and twirled the combination.

"I see; safe bind, safe find," said Markham, with a laugh for a weak pun. "Let me know when—or if—you want me to have a talk with dad about the financing. So long."

* * * * * * *

So much for the night when Betty Lawson, daughter of the physics professor at the college, starred in their Little Theater association's production. At a comparatively early hour the following morning, Wally Markham, getting out his roadster to drive to town for a box of congratulatory roses to be taken to the successful actress, was called to the telephone. A strained voice that he barely recognized as Landis' came to him over the wire.

"Is that you, Wally? For heaven's sake, come around here to the house as quick as you can. My safe's been opened and the black box is gone!"

CHAPTER II

A Blind Lead

Landis was waiting at the driveway gate when Markham's roadster came to a stand, and his thin face seemed to have grown haggard overnight.

"It wasn't my imagination, after all—that feeling I told you about last night, the feeling that some one was spying upon me as I worked," he said. And as they entered the small building, "This is just as I found it a few minutes before I 'phoned you."

Markham stooped to look into the safe, the door of which was standing open.

"It was opened on the combination?" he said.

"Of course—it had to be. The thief knew what was inside and knew that he couldn't dynamite the safe without taking a long chance of destroying the thing he was after. I found it just as it stands now; the bolts shot, and the dial standing on the final figure of the combination."

"Um; that brings on more talk, right at the beginning of things. Somebody know your combination?"

The question seemed to plunge the inventor into a deep pit of embarrassment.

"I can't say positively, Wally. But—but the one person who may know the combination is as far above suspicion as the stars are above the earth."

"Come clean," said Markham, with his good-natured grin. "If I'm going to help, I've got to know the insides—all of it, haven't I? Who is this person who may know?"

"I'll tell you, and you'll see that there's nothing to it—that there can't be. One day, a few weeks ago, I brought Betty out here to show her an electrical toy I'd been tinkering on. I was keeping the thing in the safe, as I do anything that I don't want to leave lying around in sight, and when I began to spin the dial she knelt beside me, saying she'd always been curious to know how a combination lock on a safe worked."

"And you showed her?"

"Of course. I explained how the tumblers were made and put together so that each time the dial stopped at the proper figure one of the tumblers would be left in the 'open' position."

"Was that all you did?"

"Not quite. To illustrate what I meant I unscrewed the back plate of the lock and called off the series of figures so she could spin the dial and see for herself how the mechanism worked. It was only a bit of byplay, as you might say, and there isn't a shadow of doubt in my mind but that Betty forgot the figure before she was an hour older. But even if she didn't, she is out of the question; she isn't the one who opened this safe last night. You know that as well as I do."

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
LEGAL DEPARTMENT.
HENRY N. BENSON,
Attorney General.

HON. MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of State.

Pursuant to Mason's Minnesota Statutes of 1927, section 46, I herewith transmit a statement of the purposes and effect of the proposed amendments to the constitution of the state of Minnesota which are to be submitted to the electors of the state at the 1932 general election, in accordance with certain acts adopted by the legislature at the 1931 session thereof.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 1

By the adoption of Laws 1931, chapter 420, the legislature has proposed an amendment to article 9, section 1, of the constitution, relating to taxation. This section now reads as follows:

"The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected for public purposes, but public burying grounds, public school houses, public hospitals, academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning, all churches, church property and houses of worship, institutions of purely public charity, and public property used exclusively for any public purpose, shall be exempt from taxation, and there may be exempted from taxation personal property not exceeding in value $200, for each household, individual or head of a family, as the legislature may determine: Provided, that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation, and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, modify or repeal any existing law providing for the taxation of the gross earnings of railroads."

If amended as proposed, this section will read as follows:

"The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected for public purposes, but public burying grounds, public school houses, public hospitals, academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning, all churches, church property and houses of worship, institutions of purely public charity, and public property used exclusively for any public purpose, shall be exempt from taxation, and there may be exempted from taxation personal property not exceeding in value $200, for each household, individual or head of the family, as the legislature may determine. The legislature may enact any law required to make the taxation of national banking associations conform to the laws of the United States. Taxes may be imposed upon incomes and on franchises and privileges measured by income, including income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies, which may be classified, and which taxes may be graduated and progressive, and the legislature may prescribe reasonable exemptions, and such taxes may be in lieu, in whole or in part, of taxes on any class or classes of real or personal property as the legislature may determine. It shall not be necessary to submit to a vote of the people any law imposing a tax upon the income, franchises or privileges of railroad companies. Any and all provisions of the constitution of this State inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed. Provided, that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation, and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, modify or repeal any existing law providing for the taxation of the gross earnings of railroads."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment

The proposed amendment is intended, first, to give the legislature specific authority to enact such laws respecting the taxation of national banking associations as will conform to the laws of the United States. The laws of the United States at present provide in substance that the states may tax the shares of a national banking association, provided that the rate of tax on such shares shall not be greater than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such state coming in competition with the business of national banks. At present the laws of Minnesota provide that shares of such a banking association shall be assessed at thirty-three and one-third per cent (33 1/3%) of their true and full value. Moneys and credits and mortgages upon and executory contracts for the sale of real estate are taxed in this state at a lower rate. The supreme court of the United States has held that the Minnesota plan of taxing shares of a national banking association is invalid because these shares are taxed at a higher rate than moneys and credits and mortgages on and executory contracts for the sale of real estate. Under the proposed amendment it is intended to give the legislature the power to enact laws for the taxation of national banks that shall be in harmony with the federal statutes on that subject, even though such laws might offend other provisions of the state constitution.

The remainder of the new matter which would be placed in said section 1 by the proposed amendment is intended to give the legislature specific authority to enact laws providing for a tax on incomes, and on franchises and privileges measured by income, including income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies. It is proposed that all incomes may be classified and that taxes may be graduated and progressive; that is to say, the rates may be different on incomes of different sizes. It is intended that the legislature shall have power to allow reasonable exemptions from such taxes and to provide that such income taxes may be in lieu, either in whole or in part, of taxes on such other classes of real or personal property as it may determine. It is proposed that any law imposing a tax upon the income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies need not be submitted to a vote of the people, as now provided by article 4, section 32a of the constitution.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The proposed amendment, if adopted, will have the following effect:

1. The legislature will have specific authority to make the laws of this state relating to taxation of national banking associations conform to the laws of the United States, notwithstanding any other provision of the state constitution.

2. The legislature will have specific authority to adopt a graduated and progressive income tax law, including a tax on franchises and privileges, as measured by income, and on the income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies. The legislature may allow reasonable exemptions and may provide that the income tax shall be in lieu, in whole or in part, of taxes on certain classes of real or personal property. Such laws taxing the income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies will not be subject to a vote of the people as provided by article 4, section 32a, of the constitution.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

First:
TAXATION OF INCOME AND NATIONAL BANKS.

Amendment to section 1, article 9, of the constitution of the State of Minnesota, relating to taxation, to authorize the imposing of taxes on incomes, and on franchises and privileges, including income, franchises and privileges of railroad companies, measured by income, which taxes may be classified, and may be graduated and progressive and providing for exemptions therefrom, and that such taxes may be in lieu, in whole or in part, of other taxes on real or personal property. It shall not be necessary to submit to a vote of the people any law imposing a tax upon the income, franchises or privileges of railroad companies. The legislature may enact any law required to make the taxation of national banking associations conform to the laws of the United States.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 2.

By the adoption of Laws 1931, chapter 418, the legislature has proposed an amendment to article 16, section 3, of the constitution, relating to taxation of motor vehicles. Said section now reads as follows:

"The legislature is hereby authorized to provide, by law, for the taxation of motor vehicles, using the public streets and highways of this state, on a more onerous basis than other personal property; provided, however, that any such tax on motor vehicles shall be in lieu of all other taxes thereon, except wheelage taxes, so-called, which may be imposed by any borough, city or village. Any such law may, in the discretion of the legislature, provide for the exemption from taxation of any motor vehicle owned by a nonresident of the state, and transiently or temporarily using the streets and highways of the state. The proceeds of such tax shall be paid in to said trunk highway sinking fund."

If the proposed amendment is adopted, this section will read as follows:

"The legislature is hereby authorized to provide, by law, for the taxation of motor vehicles, using the public streets and highways of this state, on a more onerous basis than other personal property; provided, however, that any such tax on motor vehicles shall be in lieu of all other taxes thereon, except wheelage taxes, so-called, which may be imposed by any borough, city or village, and except that the legislature may impose such tax upon motor vehicles of companies paying taxes under gross earnings system of taxation and upon the right to use such vehicles upon the public highways notwithstanding the fact that earnings from such vehicles may be included in the earnings of such companies upon which such gross earnings taxes are computed. Any such law may, in the discretion of the legislature, provide for the exemption from taxation of any motor vehicle owned by a nonresident of the state, and transiently or temporarily using the streets and highways of the state. The proceeds of such tax shall be paid in to said trunk highway sinking fund."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment

Under our present laws certain corporations, associations and individuals pay taxes to the state based on their gross earnings. Our supreme court has held that corporations, associations and individuals paying a gross earnings tax in the operation of their business in lieu of other taxes are not subject to payment of taxes on their motor vehicles operated on the highways of the state. It is intended by this amendment to authorize the legislature to make such vehicles subject to the motor vehicle tax, notwithstanding the payment by the owners of a gross earnings tax.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The effect of the proposed amendment to article 16, section 3, will be to permit the legislature to impose the same tax on motor vehicles using our public highways and owned by a corporation, association or individual paying a gross earnings tax as is imposed on other motor vehicles.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

Second:
TAXATION OF CERTAIN MOTOR VEHICLES.

Amendment of article 16, section 3, of the constitution, relating to the taxation of motor vehicles of companies paying taxes under the gross earnings system of taxation.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 3.

By the adoption of Laws 1931, chapter 417, the legislature has proposed an amendment to article 8 of the constitution by adding thereto a new section, to be known as section 8, to read as follows:

"Any of the public lands of the state, including lands held in trust for any purpose, may, with the approval of a commission consisting of the governor, the attorney general and the state auditor, be exchanged for lands of the United States as the legislature may provide, and the lands so acquired shall be subject to the trust, if, any, to which the lands exchanged therefor were subject, and the state shall reserve all mineral and water and water power rights in lands so transferred by the state."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment

By article 8, section 2, of the constitution, school and swamp lands owned by the state may not be disposed of other than at public sale. The purpose of the proposed amendment is to abrogate this requirement, in so far as the disposal of such lands to the federal government is concerned, by authorizing the legislature to provide, with the approval of a commission consisting of the governor, the attorney general and the state auditor, for the exchange with the United States of such state lands in return for lands owned by the federal government, the state specifically reserving all mineral and water and water power rights in lands so transferred, and the lands so acquired being subject to the trust, if any, to which the lands exchanged therefor were subject.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The effect of the proposed amendment, if adopted, will be to abrogate the constitutional requirement that school and swamp lands be disposed of only by public sale and will permit the legislature to authorize the exchange of such lands for lands of the United States, with the approval of a commission consisting of the governor, the attorney general and the state auditor. All mineral and water and water power rights in lands so transferred are reserved to the state. The proceeds of sales of federal lands so acquired by exchange would be subject, under the proposed amendment, to the same trusts as the state lands which were conveyed.

The ballots used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

Third:
EXCHANGE OF STATE AND FEDERAL LANDS.

Amendment of article 8 of the constitution, authorizing the exchange of public lands of the state for lands of the United States, as the legislature may provide.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 4.

By the adoption of Laws 1931, chapter 419, the legislature has proposed and amendment to article 9, section 10, of the constitution. This section now reads as follows:

"The credit of the state shall never be given or loaned in aid of any individual, association or corporation, except as hereinafter provided. Nor shall there be any further issue of bonds denominated 'Minnesota State Railroad Bonds,' under what purports to be an amendment to section ten (10) of article nine (9) of the Constitution, adopted April 15th, 1858, which is hereby expunged from the Constitution, saving, excepting and reserving to the state, nevertheless, all rights, remedies and forfeitures accruing under said amendment: Provided, however, that for the purpose of developing the agricultural resources of the state, the state may establish and maintain a system of rural credits and thereby loan money and extend credit to the people of the state upon real estate security in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by law, and to issue and negotiate bonds to provide money to be so loaned. The limit of indebtedness contained in section 5 of this article shall not apply to the provisions of this section, and the purposes for which the credit of the state or the aforesaid municipal subdivisions thereof may be given or loaned as herein provided are declared to be public purposes."

If the proposed amendment is adopted, the section will read as follows:

"The credit of the state shall never be given or loaned in aid of any individual, association or corporation, except as hereinafter provided. Nor shall there be any further issue of bonds denominated 'Minnesota State Railroad Bonds,' under what purports to be an amendment to section ten (10) of article nine (9) of the Constitution, adopted April 15, 1858, which is hereby expunged from the Constitution, saving, excepting and reserving to the state, nevertheless, all rights, remedies and forfeitures accruing under said amendment: Provided, however, that for the purpose of developing the agricultural resources of the state, the state may establish and maintain a system of rural credits and thereby loan money and extend credit to the people of the state upon real estate security in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by law, and to issue and negotiate bonds to provide money to be so loaned. The limit of indebtedness contained in section 5 of this article shall not apply to the provisions of this section, and the purposes for which the credit of the state or the aforesaid municipal subdivisions thereof may be given or loaned as herein provided are declared to be public purposes.

"The legislature may authorize the taxing of any lands, title to which is acquired by the state through the operation of such system of rural credits, during the period such lands are held by the state, and for the assessment thereof for benefits arising from improvements, and may provide for the payment of such taxes and assessments out of the funds arising from the sale of such bonds or the operation of such system of rural credits. In lieu of such taxation the legislature may appropriate out of such funds without discrimination to all the school districts, towns, counties, cities, villages and boroughs in which such lands are located sums of money not exceeding the amounts which would have been realized by such governmental subdivisions from the assessments against or taxation of such lands if privately owned."

The Purpose of the Proposed Amendment

By reason of the operation of the Department of Rural Credit the state of Minnesota has acquired title to a large amount of improved farm lands. Property owned by the state is not subject to taxation. The purpose of this proposed amendment is to give the legislature constitutional authority to subject lands acquired through the operation of the system of rural credits to taxation and the payment of assessments for improvements, and to provide that such taxes and assessments be paid out of funds arising from the sale of bonds or the operation of such system of rural credits. It is further intended to permit the legislature to appropriate out of such funds, without discrimination, to all the school districts, towns, counties, cities, villages and boroughs of the state in which such lands are located, sums of money not exceeding the amounts which would have been realized by such governmental subdivisions from the assessments against or taxation of such lands if privately owned.

The Effect of the Proposed Amendment

If adopted, the proposed amendment will enable the legislature, in its discretion, to subject real estate acquired by the state through the operation of the system of rural credits to taxation and the payment of assessments, the same as lands privately owned. The legislature may provide that such taxes and assessments be paid from the rural credit funds, or it may appropriate from such funds to the school districts, towns, counties, cities, villages and boroughs of the state in which such lands are located, without discrimination, an amount not exceeding what would have been realized by these governmental subdivisions from assessments against or taxation of such lands if privately owned.

The ballot used at the election should have printed thereon the following:

Fourth:
TAXATION OF RURAL CREDITS LANDS

Amendment to section 10 of article 9 of the constitution of the State of Minnesota, to authorize the taxing of lands acquired by the state through the operation of the system of rural credits and the appropriation of money from the funds of the Department of Rural Credits.

Death of Sam Mickelson

Funeral sevices were conducted here on Tuesday afternoon from the Nazareth Lutheran church for Sam Mickelson, one of the pioneers of this community who passed away at his hotel here on Sunday morning at 8:15 o'clock after a lingering illness of several weeks' duration.

Sam Mickelson was born in Norway, Nov. 9, 1859 and was at the time of his death 72 years, 11 months and 14 days old. He was baptized and confirmed in the Lutheran church in Norway. When a young man he emigrated to America and settled at Manistee, Mich., where he spent a few years. Later he moved to Crookston, Minn., and at that place on Sept. 11, 1897 he was united in marriage to Marit Storholm. This union was blessed with four children.

After a period of six years' residence in Crookston, Mr. Mickelson and family moved to the vicinity of Randen in the northeast corner of this county, where they homesteaded for six years before moving to Middle River where they lived for one year. They moved to Holt in 1910. Here they joined the Nazareth Lutheran church and were active members for many years. They operated a hotel here until the past few years.

In 1918 a daughter, Mrs. Racine Olson passed away from their midst and in 1924 Mrs. Mickelson passed into the great beyond.

He leaves to mourn his loss three daughters, Mrs. A. H. Nannestad, Lake Park, Mrs. A. C. Burtness, Holt, and Mrs. C. V. Kroke, Stephen; three grandchildren, Marcella and Raymond Olson, Thief River Falls, and Romal Burtness Holt. He also leaves three sisters, Mrs. H. Safford, Thief River Falls and two at Manistee, Mich. and two brothers, Gunder and Andrew Mickelson of Crookston.

Rev. Redal spoke the funeral sermon and interment was made in the ridge cemetery. The Carlson Merc. Co., had charge of all arrangements with Arvid Carlson Funeral director.

Out of town friends and relativs who attended the funeral were: Mr. and Mrs. H. Safford, Racine Olson, Marcella Olson and Mrs. C. L. Heinze, Thief River Fall, Mr. and Mrs. M. T. Olson, Mrs. Robert Mulholland, Gunder, Andrew and Charles Mickelson, Mr. and Mrs. Otto Reensmidt, and Mrs. M. O. Mattson from Crookston.

F. A. Green of Stephen, prominent farmer and candidate for representative in the legisslature from Marshall county, was a visitor in town Monday to call on the voters in this vicinity.

YOUR GRAIN ELEVATOR MAN KNOWS SOMETHING ABOUT BREAD BAKING

An Interview with Bill Higgins Which Only Goes to Show That You Can't Make a Success of A Business Unless You Know Something About It

Jed Hopkins, The Philosopher Who Never Went To College

WELL, folks, yu know, it's a funny thing but sometimes when I gits to goin' aroun' askin' questions from folks, I finds out some things that I'd oughta a knowed before, they was so plain. But I just kinda missed seein' the meanin'. But I guess everybody's like that more or less.

Now yu take th' other day when I had orders to go over to Bill Higginses elevator an' git a certain brand of flour. Bill sells flour 'n' feeds 'n' fools around with such things. So I sez to Bill, I sez, "Bill, how come yu sell flour? I allus thought a man wuz supposed t' know what things wuz good fer an' I wuz just figurin' bakin' bread 'n' cakes 'n' such ter be kinda out of your line."

"Well Jed," says Bill, "I'll tell yu, now I don't know so much about bakin' bread an' such but, lemme tell yu that my wife knows how to bake—an' I'm a right fair jedge of th' results. But," continners Bill, "yu wuz jus' sent over t' me to git some of thet Gold Medal "Kitchen-tested" Flour that I sell. Now yu figger it out. D'yu suppose yu'd be sent here to git it if it weren't just th' ticket? 'Course not! 'N' lemme tell yu, Jed, yu ain't th' only one what hez his orders to git it. Yu see, the womenfolk hereabout 're pretty much up on bakin' an' they know what works th' best. That's why I'm a bakin' expert, too. I'm just expert nuff t' know that th' flour all th' womenfolk in these parts has t' have is th' flour that bakes th' best. An' th' one I'm agoin' to sell."

So I gets m' flour and goes on along home. An' I couldn't help but think that Bill wuz right. Becuz if most of th' womenfolk wanted one kind of flour bad enough, then like Bill says, 'twaren't no use to hold back on 'em. An' seein' how Bill's bin at it fer thirty year or more, I guess he oughta know by this time what kinda flour's most in deemand roun' these parts.

Guess th' moral is thet t' be successful yu don't only have t' know what th' public wants in yore own line of business, but yu have t' figger out and give 'em what they're gonna like th' best.

SYNOPSIS

Owen Landis, young inventor, in the little town of Carthage, has developed an extraordinary "silencer," which is stolen from a safe in his laboratory. Landis tells Wally Markham, his chum, the only person, beside himself, knowing the combination of the safe, is Betty Lawson, daughter of a college professor, with whom the inventor is in love.

"Naturally," Markham agreed, rather too readily, adding, "As you say, Betty probably forgot the figures as fast as you called them off to her. So far as that goes, there is now and then an expert who can open a simple lock like this by putting an ear against the door and listening for the sound of the tumblers as they come around into place. The question is, who did it in this particular instance."

"There is one thing certain, Wally. Whoever opened the safe knew what was in it. I'm convinced of that. Which means that the thing I feared most has come to pass. The thief knows what the black box will do, and it will be used to swell the sum total of crime in this crime-ridden day!"

Markham straightened up, and as he did so he found himself facing the window directly over the laboratory bench.

"Don't you shut that window at night?" he asked.

"It is left shut all the time, excepting on hot days, and it is always fastened at night, as you see it now."

"Yes, I see the fastening; but look here"—pointing—"see this crack between the two sashes? That is where your spy has been listening in. Suppose we go outside and see if he left a clew of any sort."

The clew—or a clew—was there—a deep footprint in the soft soil under the window. Most unmistakably it had been made by a woman's shoe.

"I say, Owen, this thickens things up a bit, doesn't it?" said Markham. "I saw a magnifying glass on your bench just now; go get it, will you?"

Landis was back in a few seconds with the glass, and Markham studied the footprint. When he looked up it was to say, "You've got pretty nearly everything in this junk shop of yours, Owen; does the list include a handfud or so of plaster of paris?"

"Why, yes; I use it sometimes for making small casting molds."

"Right. Wet up a pound or so and bring it here."

Landis obeyed, and when the plaster came, Markham poured it into the footprint and left it to set.

"So much for a small preliminary," he said, as he got upon his feet. "When that plaster sets, we'll have a cast of the lady's foot—or shoe."

"I can't see what you hope to do with that plaster cast," Landis demurred, after they had returned to the laboratory. "A woman's shoe—any shoe, for that matter—would have thousands of duplicates."

"The footprint is a clew, a slender one, I'll admit, but still a clew. The plaster cast will preserve it, for whatever it may be worth—which may be just nothing at all. Let's dig out a few more details, if we can. Was the door locked when you came here this morning?"

"It was; but that proves nothing. It has only an ordinary lock which anybody could pick with a bit of bent wire."

"Sure. Getting into a building—any building—is the easiest part of a burglar's job."

"You think the woman who made the footprint was the burglar, as well as the spy?"

"As to that, it's all guesswork, of course," Markham asserted, "but one of my guesses is that the woman whose footprint we are embalming wasn't the spy, what ever else she may have been."

"What makes you think that?"

"The position of the print, for one thing. It was made by the left foot, and it is parallel with the house wall and not at right angles to it, as it would have been if the owner of the foot had been facing the window. Apart from this, it was made by a person walking—not standing still; or I'm guessing it was. It is deeper at the heel than at the ball of the foot."

"What have you been doing, Wally, reading Sherlock Holmes?"

"Not quite that," Markham denied with a grin. "Just one of my little sideshows. That footprint was made by somebody coming from the alley through the passage between this shack and the fence; walking, and not stopping under the window. Is there a gate in the alley fence?"

"There is; yes."

"Let's go and have a look at it."

Together they went around to the alley gate. It was properly hooked. Still, as Markham pointed out, this meant nothing, since the hook could be reached from the outside for its replacement. Upon opening the gate and stepping into the alley they came upon more footprints, in which a man's were interwoven with those of the woman, and the track of an automobile.

"How about these?" Markham asked. "Who uses the alley for a driveway?"

"Nobody, that I know of. All the houses in both streets have driveways from the front, both for their own autos and for coal deliveries and the like."

"All right; then we may venture another guess. Your thief—or rather, thieves, for we know now there were at least two of them, a man and a woman—came here in a car, got out, passed through the gate, and went through the passage on their way to the shop door. Any objections?"

"None at all, that I can see. But why were there two of them, Wally? Why would a crook double his risk by fetching a woman along?"

"That is the mystery, or at least one of them. Or, wait; maybe the woman went in alone. Let's see about that."

A careful examination proved that the man and the woman had gone in together, and that the man had walked on the woman's right and in the weeds, which accounted for the fact that his tracks were indistinct.

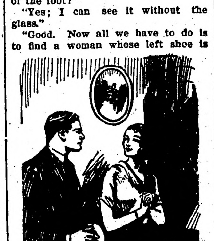
By this time the plaster cast had hardened sufficiently to permit its removal and handling, and they took it into the laboratory and dried it slowly in the glow of the electric stove. When the cast was quite dry and hard Markham made a close examination of the sole of the plaster-copied shoe.

"What are you looking for?" Landis wanted to know.

"See that faint line across the ball of the foot?"

"Yes; I can see it without the glass."

"Good. Now all we have to do is to find a woman whose left shoe is marked in the same way, and we have at least one of your two housebreakers."



"You're a Dear, Wally; Always a Dear!"

Troubled as he was, Landis had to smile.

"Of course," he said; "Just as easy as that! There are only some twenty or twenty-five thousand people in Carthage, and only a due proportion of that number of women. Do we swear out search warrants and make every woman in town produce her shoes?"

"Well," Markham returned good-temperedly. "We shall see what we shall see. Meanwhile, we'll preserve this bit of circumstantial evidence"—putting the plaster cast into his pocket. "You haven't notified the police of your loss, have you?"

"No; the only thing I've done was to call you up."

"That's sensible; let it continue to be the only thing for the present. If you should pull the police in, you'd have to tell them what was stolen; describe the black box and give it a name. If you should do that, you'd be set down as a lunatic or a liar. The thing to do is to sit tight in the boat and wait. Something may turn up if we don't roll the water too hastily. Don't you agree with me?"

"I guess so," said Landis, with the air of one who is still finding it difficult to bring calm judgment to bear. "I'll do as you advise, but the waiting is going to be desperately hard. You'll keep in touch, won't you?"

"Surest thing you know!" Markham returned heartily; and with that, he started his motor and drove away.

CHAPTER III

Betty Lawson

Upon leaving the Landis place Markham drove to a florist's shop and got the box of congratulatory roses for which he had telephoned that morning.

With the box on the seat beside him he headed his car for the grounds of one of the oldest institutions for higher learning in the Middle West. He hadn't been entirely frank with Landis—couldn't be, in the circumstances—and the reason for the unfrankness dated back to a game of golf at the Country club; a round played with Betty Lawson on a drizzly day when they had both finished with damp clothes and wet feet.

After the game he had urged Betty to let him drive her home quickly for a change, but she had refused to be hurried. There was a cheerful open fire in the club lounge and they had sat for a time before this, toasting their feet at the blaze. He remembered that Betty had rested her feet on the hot fender, and he had told her she would burn the soles of her shoes. She had burned one of them, the left one; he had seen the mark when she lifted her foot to feel if the shoe were getting too hot.

This small circumstance was a sufficient reason for the drive out to the college campus. If Landis had not admitted that he had shown Betty how to work the combination of the laboratory safe, the mere fact that the magnifying glass had shown a faint line running across the ball of the foot in the soft soil—imprint under Landis' window wouldn't have suggested the thought of connecting Betty with the disappearance of the black box. But the telltale mark, added to Landis' admission, seemed to leave little room for doubt, though even with the evidence thus all but conclusive, the thing was blankly incredible.

As he let the blue roadster amble along toward the college suburb, Markham tried to convince himself of the absurdity of the circumstantial evidence conclusion. First, it involved the assumption that, instead of going directly home after the play, Betty had delayed her return for at least an hour, since it was nearly midnight before the black box had been locked up in the laboratory safe. Again, the automobile track and the double set of footprints in the alley proved that two persons were concerned, and if Betty were the woman, Canby must have been the man, since he was her escort for the evening.

Reaching this point, Markham told himself that the thing was blankly unbelievable. Betty might play a trick on Owen; but that she would make a man her accomplice was ridiculously incredible. Also, there was the matter of the fire-marked shoe. Would Betty have worn a pair of golf shoes to the theater? Markham weighted the probabilities for and against, and the "againsts" had it by an overwhelming majority.

He parked his car in front of the Lawson house and ran up the steps with the box under his arm. When the maid came to answer his ring he was told that Miss Betty had gone across the campus on an errand for her father and would be back in a few minutes. Would he come in and wait?

He would and did; and after the maid had shown him into the parlor and had gone back to her work, a masterful temptation assailed him. With Betty, who was her father's housekeeper, out of the way, and the professor busy with his classes in the near-by college buildings, he knew he was alone in the house, save for the maid. He knew which one of the upper rooms was Betty's. At the prompting of an impulse quite as lawless as the one—Betty's or another's—that had led to the burglarizing of Landis' safe, he ran rapidly up the stairs to the floor above.

He hoped he might find the door of Betty's chamber standing open, and it was. Feeling more like a sneak-thief than anything else, he went in. There was a pair of shoes standing beside the dressing chair. Were they the shoes she had worn to and from the theater—changing, of course, when she costumed for her part on the stage? He was afraid they were, and he wished she had put them away; hidden them so that he couldn't find them.

Since she hadn't—he picked up the left shoe and examined the sole. It not only bore the telltale crease across the ball of the foot; to the concaved front of the low heel adhered a visible trace of the black soil of the Landis back yard. Not to leave the smallest chance of uncertainty, he took the plaster cast from his pocket and compared it with the shoe sole. The marks were identical. While he was wishing heartily that he could discredit the evidence of his own eyes, he happened to glance out of the window, and saw the owner of the accusing shoe tripping across the campus toward the house. In frantic haste he replaced the shoe beside its mate, pocketed the cast and dashed down the stairs and into the parlor a breathless moment before he heard Betty fitting her key into the latch of the hall door.

"If I need an excuse for this early morning brash, here it is," he said, giving her the congratulatory box. "I wanted to be first in the field."

"Oh, how perfectly gorgeous!" she cried, when the box was opened. "You're a dear, Wally; always a dear! Why doesn't some nice girl find it out and make away with you?"

"Exactly what I've asked myself dozens of times," he laughed. "But while there's life, there's hope. How are you feeling after last night's struggle?"

"Oh—was it a struggle? Did it look that way to you? What made you and Owen take a stage box? Did you think you might be able to rattle me and make me forget my lines?"

"Sheer devotion," he explained in mock tenderness. "We wanted to be as near you as possible. Your work was splendid. Not feeling any after-effects at all?"

She dropped into a chair and passed her hand over her forehead.

"Sit down for a few minutes, won't you? After-effects, you say? I'll admit it was a bit of a struggle, last night. I had stage fright horribly, at first"—and she went on telling him just how the fright complex had attacked her.

Sitting opposite, Markham listened, and as she talked the testimony of the circumstantial evidence became still more unbelievable. Surely if she had taken the leading part in a burglary an hour after the play, she couldn't sit there chatting with him apparently without a single trace of self-consciousness. Yet there was the accusing footprint under Landis' workshop window and the confirmatory shoe in the room overhead.

"Weren't you pretty tired when the thing was over?" he asked.

Rat Trap Watch Charm

A rat trap of gold is one of the many royal relics and curiosities which was exhibited in public for the first time this fall in the king's palace of Stockholm. It is small and enameled, and made for a watch-charm rather than for use. Snuff boxes in precious metals, deformed bullets extracted from the wounds of Swedish kings, jeweled decorations and odd mementoes found in various Swedish palaces, miniature portraits of princes and even royal regalias found in the tombs of kings are included.

Supercilious Youth

"When that young man asked you to marry him," said Mr. Cumrox, "why didn't you tell him to see me?"

"I did," replied his daughter, demurely. "He said he had already seen you and that he didn't find your appearance especially objectionable."

Relief From Neuralgia In Few Minutes

Quick Dissolving Property of BAYER ASPIRIN Starts Relief 3 or 4 Minutes After Taking

Think of a headache going in three or four minutes. The pains of neuralgia, neuritis or rheumatism being eased, often, in that little space of time!

Due to important, scientific developments in the famous Bayer Aspirin laboratories, millions of people are enjoying this almost unbelievably quick relief from pain.

That is because Bayer Aspirin dissolves almost instantly in the stomach. And thus almost INSTANTLY starts to ease pain. The average headache, for instance, eases in as little as four or five minutes. Think of what a time saver this is to busy people.

Remember it is Genuine BAYER Aspirin which provides this unique property. So see that you get the real article when you buy. See that these three words "Genuine Bayer Aspirin" are on any box or bottle of aspirin that you buy. And that the name "Bayer" is stamped in the form of a cross on any tablet that you take.

Remember that when you buy. And remember, too, that Genuine Bayer Aspirin cannot harm the heart. Take care you get the genuine.

NO TABLETS ARE GENUINE BAYER ASPIRIN WITHOUT THIS CROSS

Amusing "Frog Races"

The frog races are an annual affair called the "Calaveras County Frog Jumping Contests," held on or about May 20, at Angels Camp, Calif. This little town is the scene of Mark Twain's classic jumping frog tale, and it is probably this story that has suggested the present contests. The last contest was attended by at least 20,000 people and the scene was highly reminiscent of frontier days. A frog named Budweiser again won the world record and broke his former record by the tremendous leap of 13 feet 5 inches.

Identified by Love Letters

Yellowed love letters penned in 1890 resulted in identification of a body as that of John J. McCarthy, sixty-one, and saved him from burial in Potter's field at Peabody, Mass. A check found among the man's effects was traced by police to a trunk, long unopened, in storage in Boston. In the trunk were found the love letters written by McCarthy in his early manhood. Through these, authorities located a brother and a sister at Potsdam, N. Y.

This Woman Lost 45 Pounds of Fat

"Dear Sirs: For 8 months I've been using your salts and am very much pleased with results. I've lost 45 lbs., 6 inches in hips and bust measure. I've taken 3 bottles—one lasting 5 weeks. I had often tried to reduce by dieting but never could keep it up, but by cutting down and taking Kruschen I've had splendid results. I highly recommend it to my friends."—Mrs. Carl Wilson, Manton, Mich.

To lose fat SAFELY and HARMLESSLY, take a half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast—don't miss a morning. To hasten results go light on fatty meats, potatoes, cream and pastries—a bottle that lasts 4 weeks costs but a trifle—but don't take chances—be sure it's Kruschen—your health comes first—get it at any drugstore in America. If not joyfully satisfied after the first bottle—money back

Bismarck.—Contracts for $10,656 maintenance machinery have been let by the state highway department.

Ellendale.—Lieut. Charles Haas arrived here from Rockwell Field, San Diego, Calif., for a few days' visit with his mother, Mrs. Mabel Haas and his sister, Mrs. Thos. Barrett. He made the entire trip by plane.

Jamestown.—Purchase of the Mayer Hotel at Devils Lake was announced here by the Roberts-McNab Hotel company, which operates the Gladstone hotel of Jamestown and the Prince hotel of Bismarck.

Grand Forks.—Receipts of sugar beets here have run from 65 to 70 cars a day, approximately 10 per cent heavier than a year ago, according to railway officials. Potato loadings, however, were far lighter than in 1931.

Grand Forks.—Potato losses running into millions of bushels have been caused by frost recently in the Grand Forks district and other parts of the Red river valley, according to reports received.

Grenora.—Father August Buser was shot four times or more as he was entering his home in the evening by someone with a .22 rifle, one bullet striking the priest in the arm. A week previous the parsonage was robbed of ten gallons of sacramental wine. The priest offered $500 reward, but as yet no one has been found.

LaMoure.—The Farmers Co-operative Creamery of LaMoure will again dress turkeys this fall, R. W. Huggett, buttermaker, announces. Although the dates are not definitely set yet, poultry raisers may be assured that turkey dressing will be carried on.

Fort Yates.—While raking hay on a farm near Fort Yates, I. L. Lloyd was bitten by a rattlesnake through his boot. At the time, Lloyd was making a repair on the harness tug and feeling a prick on his ankle, looked down to discover the rattler trying to shake his fangs loose from the shoe leather.

Jamestown.—O. H. Zink of Chicago has purchased the Fuller and Henderson ranch, five miles southeast of the city, according to an announcement made by J. F. Henderson. Mr. Henderson sold his large stock of horses, cattle and farm equipment at one of the largest public sales held in the county in years.

Valley City.—Residents of Barnes and Ransom counties will join hands in dedicatory exercises for the new bridge over the Sheyenne river, about 25 miles south of here, Sunday, October 23, according to plans being arranged by the bicentennial committee of Barnes county. A bronze marker has been ordered and the dedication program will occur at 2:00 p. m.

Harvey.—Patrick Haggerty, son of Mr. and Mrs. M. E. Haggerty, was recently elected president of the sophomore class at Marquette university, Milwaukee, Wis. Haggerty, who is taking a five-year course in electrical engineering, had highest marks in his class of 151 students for the past two semesters and is in line for a gold medal if he is within ten of the highest mark during the present semester.

New Rockford.—Representatives of nine North Dakota cities recently formed the North Dakota Traffic association here. Purpose of the state-wide organization is to raise funds to combat proposed changes in the Western Trunk line case asked by the railroads of the interstate commerce commission and which, if granted, would raise freight rates from and to North Dakota.

Carson.—Rattlesnakes, whole families of them, are all in the day's work for M. J. Besser of Shields and Andrew Sepchenko of Kief, N. Dak. They killed 17 reptiles in as many minutes in the Badlands near Shields recently. The two boys were walking through the hills when rattlers emerged from the ground on all sides of them. Besser went into action with a club, battering 12 reptiles senseless, while Sepchenko won the right to put five notches on the stock of the shotgun he carried.

Fargo.—Saturday, October 22, is the North Dakota Agricultural college annual Homecoming day with one of the main features of the day the traditional struggle against the University of North Dakota football team at Dacotah field, where perhaps the largest crowd in Fargo football history will congregate. To the graduate coming the greatest distance to attend the event, a buffalo robe, emblem of the Bison, will be presented. A homecoming program, with little features that make it the most elaborate yet accomplished, is prepared for the alumni before and after the football clash with the Sioux. There will also be the parade at 10 o'clock Saturday morning showing the many beautiful floats made up by different organizations and clubs. A football game between the freshmen teams of the university and the A. C. is scheduled for Friday evening.

Grand Forks.—Modern methods of nurse instruction were presented by Miss Lucille Petry, assistant professor of nursing at the University of Minnesota, at the convention of the North Dakota Nurses association in Grand Forks recently.

Dickinson.—Petitions asking for a local elevator are being prepared by the Dickinson Farmers National Grain corporation, according to Laudie Ridl, chairman of an elevator committee. The petition cites Dickinson's local as one of the most important wheat shipping points in the state.

MIXTURE OF COLOR IN THE SAPPHIRE

Stone Long Famous for Its Wide Range.

Sapphire, the birthstone of September, may be golden, yellow, pink, brown, black, gray, blue, green or violet, and occasionally has no color at all! The term, to the lapidary, means any corundum except the ruby, and includes the oriental amethyst, the oriental peridot and the oriental topaz as well as the brilliant, lustrous blue stone to which people through the ages have given the title "sapphire."

Corundum is a combination of oxygen and aluminium, created in the volcanic fires of the dawn of time, says Nature Magazine of Washington. Like Cleopatra, "age cannot wither nor custom stale" its infinite variety, and yet the wide range of colors is caused merely by minute impurities which crept into the atomic structure of the stone.

It is one of the marvels of the mineral kingdom that a crystal occasionally is blue on one-half the length of the crystal and yellow on the other half; or that sometimes the blue and red alternate in thin stripes to impart to the crystal a purplish plum color.

And it is equally marvelous that some stones, viewed through the length of the crystal, appear blue although a side view discloses them as a reddish plum shade or without color at all! How or why these phenomena occur is still unexplained, although it is known that the oxides of chromium, titanium and iron will produce stones colored red, blue, yellow and brown. In any event, the result of them are either rubies or sapphires, and the beauty-loving world is far richer for their creation.

Epiphanes, a writer of the Sixteenth century, has written that the vision Moses saw on the Mount was within the crystal of a sapphire, and that the original Tables of the Law were made of the same material. Whether his account is authentic or not, it is known that the Greeks had dedicated the gem to Apollo, the god of prophecy, long before the Christian era, and, when consulting this deity's oracle at Delphi, inquirers wore this jewel to secure quick and favorable answers to their petitions.

Death-Dealing Accuracy

Air experts state that a fighting troops themselves are not a worth-while target. In so far as air bombers attack an army, they will aim at its bases, or its routes of supply. Roads, like railways, are fixed and easy targets. One well-aimed bomb, one wrecked vehicle, and the whole transport column is blocked. But if such transport were composed of powerful cross-country vehicles these could turn off the road, climb over ditch or bank, crash through the bordering hedge, and pursue their way across the fields. Once free of the road, vehicles are a difficult air target.

Youth's Peculiar Diet

Delbert Fadden, age nineteen, of Seattle, Wash., says he dined on bugs, berries and frogs for 15 days "just for the fun of it." The boy had gone into the heavily forested Olympic peninsula without weapons, maps or compass on a photographing jaunt. He liked it so well that when his food ran out after 14 days he lived on what he could find for two weeks more.

Mother of 7—Still Young

THE woman who gives her organs the right stimulant need not worry about growing old.

Her system doesn't stagnate; her face doesn't age. She has the health and "pep" that come from a lively liver and strong, active bowels.

When you're sluggish and the system needs help, don't take a lot of "patent medicines." There's a famous doctor's prescription for just such cases, and every druggist keeps this standard preparation. It is made from fresh laxative herbs, active senna, and pure pepsin. Just ask for Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin. Take a little every day or so, until every organ in your body feels the big improvement.

The next time you have a bilious headache, or feel all bound-up, take this delicious syrup instead of the usual cathartic. You'll be rid of all that poisonous waste, and you haven't weakened the bowels. You'll have a better appetite, and feel better in every way. The constant use of cathartics is often the cause of a sallow complexion and lines in the face. And so unnecessary!

Would you like to break yourself of the cathartic habit? At the same time building health and vigor that protects you from frequent sick spells, headaches, and colds? Get a big bottle of Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin today. Use often enough to avoid those attacks of constipation. When you feel weak and run-down or a coated tongue or bad breath warns you the bowels need to be stimulated. Give it to children instead of strong laxatives that sap their strength. It isn't expensive.

Home Baking Now Greatly Simplified

By the development of a new type of flour—GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Flour—baking has been remarkably simplified for the housewife. And the cause of most baking disappointments banished—lack of uniformity in the flour used; the chance of two sacks of the same brand varying greatly in results.

GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Flour means flour that has been tested in a home oven, just like yours, for uniformity of results, before it goes to you. Every batch tested for home baking of cakes, pies, pastries, breads, by a number of experts directed by the noted cooking authority, Betty Crocker.

"Kitchen-tested" Recipes are likewise "Kitchen-tested" scientifically the same way. Thus the flour acts the same way, the recipe the same way every time you bake. No guesswork, no uncertainty. Results are unvarying. Baking simplified amazingly.

For the Great Kitchen Thrill, try this way today. Get GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Flour at any grocery store. The "Kitchen-tested" Recipes For Foods Men Like—including the one for Jack o' Lantern Smiles—are inside the sack.

SPECIAL OCTOBER CLEARANCE
TRADE-IN SALE
on Firestone
NON-SKID TIRES

FISCAL year closes October 31, and we are offering unusual bargains during the month of October.

October and November are the dangerous months of the year for driving. Trade in your thin, worn tires for Firestone non-skid tires, used by race drivers because they are the safest tires in the world.

Glen Schultz recently set a new world's record for the Pikes Peak climb, where hairpin turns were made at high speeds and where a skid or tire failure meant death.

All world's records on road and track, for safety, speed, mileage and endurance are held by Firestone Gum-Dipped Non-Skid tires.

Come in today and exchange your smooth, thin, worn tires for the safest and best tires you can buy.

They cost you no more — besides, in this October Clearance Sale we will give you a liberal allowance on your old tires in exchange for these safe non-skid Firestone tires.

The Firestone tread is designed with angles and projections to give the maximum traction and non-skid. The brakes can stop the wheels, but the tires must stop the car.

Norby-Nelson

A very pretty wedding was solomnized on Wednesday afternoon, October 26th at the home of Mrs. Carrie Norby, 235 Tindolph Ave. No., in Thief River Falls, when her daughter, Miss Hilda Norby became the bride of Joseph G. Nelson of Holt. Rev. A. E. Jacobson performed the ceremony before an improvised alter of yellow, green, and white banked with ferns and chrysanthemums. They were attended by Miss Anne Norby and Theodore Norby, brother and sister of the bride, both of Minneapolis.

The bride wore a dress of maroon chiffon velvet with a crystal necklace, a gift of the groom, and carried a bouquet of American Beauty Roses. The bridesmaid wore a dress of blue crepe and chiffon velvet, and carried tea roses.

After the ceremony, turkey dinner was served to thirty relatives and friends of the bridal pair, by Mrs. Norby. Yellow and white appointments were carried out in the table decorations, and a large wedding cake of the same color.

The bride is well known to the people here, having taught one term in our local school. The groom has been a resident here the past eighteen years and has taken an active part in social and business affairs.

The newleyweds are now settled down to housekeeping in the groom's house in the north end of town.

The News joins their friends here in wishing them happiness and success.

Death of Mrs. Hoffman

Mrs. Magdalena Hoffman, 88, died Wednesday, October 26, at her home in Excel Township. Mrs. Hoffman was born May 27, 1864, in Germany, and came directly from there to Excell township where she has resided the past 43 years. June 25, 1889, she was married to Constantine Hoffman.

She leaves to mourn her departure her husband and five children: Fredolin of Kempton, N. Dak.; Mrs. Mike Gorman of Grand Forks; Sister Borgia of Crookston, and August and Bernard at home. Also three sisters, Mrs. August Hoffman of Excell township, Kathryn Linke and Mathilda Krause in Germany, and four grandchildren servive.

She was a member of the Holy Name Society and a member of St. Bernard's Catholic church in Thief River Falls from which church funeral services were conducted at 10:30 o'clock on Saturday.

Club Members To St. Paul

The Holt 4-H Club sent six of its members to South St. Paul this week to take in the Junior Livestock Show and Sale.

Those from here to make the trip were: Martin and Lloyd Larson, Lewis and Margaret Sagstuen, Olive Moberg, and Reuben Benitt.

Besides the calves taken down there by our local club members there were two calves, thirteen lambs, and three hogs from other clubs in the county and some from Pennington and Beltrami counties, making a carload of twenty-five head shipped from here to the show.

Red Cross Roll Call

The annual Roll Call of the American Red Cross will be held from Armistice Day, Nov. 11, to Thanksgiving Day, Nov. 24. The need for a large membership is greater this year than at any time since the war. The Red Cross, thru its aid to the needy and disaster-stricken, will fill a most important place in the relief program of the nation. The appeal goes out to every American citizen and patriot to rally to the call of the "World's Greatest Morther," the Red Cross. It needs your help in the relief of the unemployed, in the flour distribution, and in clothing the needy from the cotton voted by Congress for distribution. In times of need the American people have responded nobly to the cause of giving aid to the less fortunate of their fellowmen, and it is with confidence that the Red Cross sends out its appeal for a greater and more inspired membership for the coming year.

When the local Red Cross worker calls at your home or place of business to solicit your membership, bear in mind the thousands of unfortunate men, women, and chidren who will be benefited by the sacrifice and generosity of Red Cross contributors. Let us not permit the appeal of the "The Greatest Mother in the World" to go unheeded. Your contribution may be the means of securing aid for some needy and unfortunate family.

The soliciters for this community will be Gladys Sanoden and Beaulah Bennes. Lay aside your membership fee and contribution now and they will be glad to give you a button and membership card when they call at your home or place of business.

SCHOOL NOTES

HIGH SCHOOL

We had a test in English III on Wednesday to complete our Grammar work. We are now starting Public Speaking, which I am sure we will all like—MAYBE.

Are you ambitious, Classmate?
The kind that's liked so well,
Or are you just contented
To never study well?
Please think this over, Classmate
And tell us what you think,
Then if you're really ambitious,
We'll put it down in ink.

In Biology Class

Miss Anderson: Page, what is the economic value of grasshoppers?

Page: To eat up the surplus.

Grades I and II

The following children had 100 in Spelling last Wednesday:

Roy, Wayne, Irene, Elaine, and Harriet.

Ruth and Ruby are absent from school because of measles. We hope they will soon be back with us.

We made snow men for our winter border in Art class today.

Each week we select the best housekeepers. Junieve is the best in Grade II. Orville Ness is the best in Grade I so far this week.

The boys are ahead of the girls in the Arithmetic race.

Grades III, IV and V

Our room had a peanut hunt and played games Monday afternoon.

The fifth grade tested corn in their Geography class. The results were good.

The children in our room are collecting stamps to see who can get the best and largest collection.

Grades VI, VII and VIII

Margaret Sagstuen is absent from school this week as she is attending the Junior Livestock Show in St. Paul.

The Seventh grade in Grammar are working on original plays.

Orlene had the best paper in the Eighth grade History test this week.

Opal Werner and Robert Sandberg had the largest number of problems correct in the Sixth grade problem scale test we had Monday.

Judge Grindeland Died

Judge Andrew Grindeland, long time district judge and pioneer Warren citizen, died unexpectedly early Friday as result of a heart attack.

Judge Grindeland had been in poor health for two years and his condition became more serious a short time ago but the heart attack that caused his death came unexpectedly.

Funeral services were held on Tuesday at 10 o'clock a. m. from the Norwegian Lutheran church in Warren

Judge Grindeland was born in Iowa in 1856. He graduated from the law department of the Iowa university and came to Warren on July 16, 1882, to practice law. October 5, 1882, he was married in Iowa and the couple returned to Warren where they have since lived.

Mr. Grindeland served in the state senate from 1899 to 1903 when he was named an additional judge to serve in this district. He was elected for a full term in 1904 and in 1910 was again elected and served until 1930 when he retired because of poor health.

Survivers are his wife and six children, Mrs. O. F. Melby, Thief River Falls; Mrs. W. R. Strunk, Mrs. E. E. Swenson and Gladys all of Warren; Mrs. J. A. Larson of Chicago; Mrs. A. R. Edwin, Medford, Ore. and Inglof, Saint Paul.

Hundreds of persons from the surrounding territory gathered at Warren October 5 to honor Judge and Mrs. Grindeland when the pioneer couple celebrated their golden wedding anniversary.

Train Collides With Car

Miss Leona Davis and Lloyd Larson who was driving her car, had a close call on Saturday afternoon when the northbound passenger struck their car as they were crossing the track a mile and a half north of town.

They came out with only a bad shaking up but the front half or the Ford coupe was busted up pretty bad.

Prize Day Drew Big Crowd

We had a big crowd in town on Saturday evening for the trade at home campaign prize drawing which was held that night at the Engen Garage. It was estimated that a crowd of three hundred people from this trade territory were in for the doings and that many more would have been here if the roads had not been so cut up.

William Davis won the $10 gold piece on a second drawing. Julian Rodahl won the $5 cash. Oscar Johnson and Chester Larson each won a 100 pound sack of flour. Albert Klungness and Mrs. Ludvig Sagstuen each got a 16 pound ham. Tony Peterson and John Augustine each won a big china tea set. Johnnie Doran and Oliver Gronvold each won a big double bed blanket. Oscar Gutrud and F. K. Fredrickson each won a linoleum rug.

After the drawing the crowd was treated to an old time dance and everybody enjoyed a great time.

Mr. Fricker, president of the Holt Commercial club announced that there will be more prize days and that the date and prizes will be advertised later.

The trade is still on and you should get your tickets and deposit the stubs.

Doll Social

A doll social will be held on Friday evening, November 11, at the Manor School, Dist. 20, two and one-half miles south and two and one-half miles east of Holt.

Ladies please bring a doll and lunch for two.

Everybody welcome!

Ten Years Through Ups and Downs

It is said what goes up must come down.

This is what happened to prices. Now that prices are down there is only one place they can go and that is up. Now is the time to have a little faith in the future and take advantage of the increases as they come along.

Through all of these ups and downs this bank has continued to serve this community. It has been tested beyond all limits and it is here to serve the people in the same old way.

The bank deeply appreciates the confidence of the people that have made it possible to weather all of these storms.

The Black Box of Silence

SYNOPSIS

Owen Landis, young inventor, in the little town of Carthage, has developed an extraordinary "silencer," which is stolen from a safe in his laboratory. Landis tells Wally Markham, his chum, the only person, beside himself, knowing the combination of the safe, is Betty Lawson, daughter of a college professor, with whom the inventor is in love. Markham takes a plaster cast of a woman's footprint, found beneath the window of the laboratory, and takes an opportunity to fit it to one of Betty's shoes. They are identical.

"I was a perfect dishrag! It made me furious. To think that I can play my eighteen holes of golf and come up smiling, and yet be wrung dry by a few hours on the stage!"

"Action and reaction," he suggested. "Nothing is more stimulating than playing to an appreciative audience, especially when the player makes such a cracking success of a part as you did of yours last night. And the aftermath of any stimulant is apt to be a let-down that leaves you flat and with a dark-brown taste in your mouth. You ought to have had a bit of supper after the play."

"I did that very thing. Bert took me to Pozzoni's."

He marked the familiar "Bert" as applied to Canby, setting it down as a measure of the distance Canby had come on the road of the rusher, though a moment's reflection told him that it might mean little in Betty's mouth. She was nothing if not modern.

"And after the supper Canby drove you home in his car?"

She nodded. "He had to. I was so sleepy I could scarcely hold my eyes open."

"Still, I suppose the long way around was the shortest way home, at that, wasn't it?" he thrust in, with his good-natured grin.

"It might have been," she admitted. "To tell the truth, I was so tired and sleepy that Bert may have been driving circles around the block for all I knew, or cared."

"'Bert,'" he said; "It's 'Bert' and 'Betty' already, is it?"

"Whoops!" she laughed. "Is that the way you feel about it? But what do you expect? You home boys are so slow. Bert signed me up for last night nearly three weeks ago, and you didn't ask me until day before yesterday. A girl has to take what she can get, doesn't she?"

"I suppose so," he yielded. In all of this lighthearted give-and-take she was the Betty he knew best; teasingly vivacious, altogether frank and friendly, wholly unembarrassed. If she were wearing a mask for him it fitted faultlessly.

His thoughts whipped back to the performance of the night before; to her almost inspired interpretation of her part in the play. Was she acting a part now?

"Some girls can reach out and take anything they have a fancy for," he said, answering her query; "you, for one, Betty, dear. You'll have a lot to answer for by the time you're a woman grown."

"I like that—'a woman grown!'" she retorted. "Am I not white, free and—well, perhaps not quite twenty-one, but near enough to take the curse off? Never mind; if you think I'm a menace to the peace of Carthage, the menace will be removed after Commencement. Daddy is going out to the wild and woolly for the summer, and he is threatening to take me along."

"Fossil hunting, I suppose?" Though the professor filled the chair of physics in the college it was well known that his hobby was paleontology.

"It wouldn't be anything else. But he promises not to take me into the wilds unless I want to go. We have friends in Brewster, in the Timanyoni, and I'm to visit with them."

"You'll have a good time, wherever you are, trust you for that," he averred. "All the same, we shall miss you, or we'll say Bert Canby will miss you."

"What makes you say that so spitefully? You shouldn't be narrow, Wally, dear."

"No," he agreed mildly, "nobody should be narrow. But I don't care so awfully much for Canby; for one thing, his eyes are too close together."

"And for other things I suppose you'd say he is too good-looking, dresses too well, is too successful in business, plays too good a game of golf and bridge. I'm afraid you are hopeless, Wally."

"Hopeless, and rather proud of it," he laughed, getting up to go. "Would you like to take a little spin this fine morning?"

"Too busy, thank you. I've a world of things to do before we close the house for the summer."

"All right," he acquiesced, "I'll vanish and let you get at it."

And with that he took his leave, with the mystery of the black box's disappearance as dense as it had been when he alighted from his car at the Lawson door.

CHAPTER IV

Broken Threads

During the four days which intervened between the disappearance of Landis' black box and the college Commencement, Markham burrowed patiently—and alone. If the footprints under Landis' laboratory window had been made by Betty Lawson, her companion, and accomplice, must have been Herbert Canby. Hence, during the four-day interval, Markham spent most of his time keeping the promoter of real estate schemes under quiet surveillance.

Nothing definitely helpful came of this. So far as outward appearance went, Canby ate, drank and slept the Greater-Carthage scheme to the exclusion of most other interests; also, he was gradually overcoming the obstacle of small-city conservatism—to the substantial increase of his deposits in the Carthage Saving Bank & Trust, of which Markham senior was the president.

Wally dropped in upon his father at the bank for a word of counsel. The young man had inherited a comfortable competence from his grandfather, the bulk of which was invested in a local tool and implement factory, the future expansion of which was threatened by one of the ramifications of Canby's schemes.

"About that tract adjoining the shops," Wally began. "I was told that Canby is trying to get an option on it. Do you know anything about it?"

"Nothing definite. Gaultney—he's taken over the handling of the estate—was here yesterday, and he said nothing about it. I'm reasonably sure he would give us a chance if anybody else were trying to tie the tract up."

"I hope he would. But Canby is pretty cagey in his deals, and he knows how much we're going to need that piece of ground some day."

"You needn't worry a bit about Canby, Wally. He's nothing but a noisy false alarm—as a good many people in this town are going to find out before they are through with him. As yet, nobody can put a finger upon anything he has done that you could call crooked, or even shady. Just the same, I shan't be surprised any day if the bookkeeper comes in to tell me that Canby's account has been checked out, lock, stock and barrel. When that happens, if it happens, I'm thinking we shall have seen the last of the young man who says he's from New York."

Markham sought Landis in his backyard workshop, and found the robbed inventor a prey to the most gloomy forebodings touching the use to which his stolen invention might be put.

"I'm a total loss, Wally," was the way he described his condition; "can't work—can't even think straight. And now Betty tells me she's leaving Carthage for the entire summer."

Markham laughed. "Which is another way of saying that the worst is yet to come, eh?" Then, "When did you see Betty?"

"Yesterday. She came to the house to tell the folks goodby. They are leaving for the West tomorrow, she and her father."

"Did she come out here to your shop?"

"Oh, she couldn't well do less than to include me in the goodbys."

"Well, what did you talk about?"

"Shucks! I wasn't fit to talk about anything. She saw it and tried to jolly me up. Wanted to know if I couldn't take the summer off and go out to the wilderness with her and her father. Of course, she didn't mean it."

"Of course not," Markham agreed brutally. "As you say, she was merely trying to jolly you up a bit. But what about the black box? Any new developments?"

"Nothing; less than nothing. I've been buying newspapers from all around and reading them for the crime news. Plenty of crime, of course, but nothing to hint at any mystery. But it will come, you mark my words!"

"Good stunt, that—watching the papers. Keep it up."

"I shall. I suppose you haven't learned anything?"

"Nothing that you could give a name to," Markham evaded. Obviously, he couldn't tell Landis the length to which he had gone in checking up the scorched shoe. Neither could he make any mention of his suspicions of Canby, since Landis knew that Canby was Betty's escort on the night of the play. It was a mess, any way one chose to look at it.

Later that afternoon Markham learned from the room clerk of the Collier house, where Canby had his rooms, that the promoter had left town, to be away overnight. Whereupon he took another lawless step in the path which, up to the present, had led nowhere. Ormsbury, manager of the hotel, was a time-tried friend, and to him Markham appealed.

"You know me pretty well, John, and I'm going to ask you to break all hotel traditions for me," was the way he began on Ormsbury. "I want to borrow the master key to the rooms on the third floor for a few minutes. Do I get it?"

"You've got your nerve, Wally," Ormsbury chuckled. "What's your lay this time? Are you posing as a room thief? Or are you playing around as an amateur detective? Whose room do you want to break into?"

"Can't we let the room number hang up in the air for the time being? I don't want to point a suspicion unless there is something to point it at."

"Then you are sleuthing? Why not turn it over to the police, and so stay on the windward side of the law? I suppose you know what will happen if you should be caught out between bases?"

"Of course. But I'm not going to be caught out. The rooms I want to break into are unoccupied just now, and you may be sure I'll leave them exactly as I find them."

"You've given yourself away," said the manager, with a laugh. "There is nobody away on the third floor excepting Mr. Canby. What have you got on him, Wally?"

"Nothing at all. I merely want to see how he lives when he's at home."

"All right," Ormsbury agreed, producing the coveted passkey. "It's smashing the traditions, as you say, but I'm banking on your discretion. Don't you want an authorized witness along?"

"No; you'd better not come. What you don't know you can swear you don't know. If anything develops, I'll promise you'll be the first to know it. Won't that answer?"

"I guess so—for this one time. But, for the Lord's sake, be careful!"

With the pick-lock key in his possession Markham made sure there was no one looking on in the corridor when he opened the door of Canby's sitting room and let himself in. The sitting room, bath, and the adjoining bedroom were all in order, and it took him but a few minutes to make a rapid but thorough search in every nook and corner large enough to conceal Landis' black box. He didn't find the box; he had scarcely hoped to.

It was when he was shutting the doors of the clothes closet wardrobe in the bedroom that he made a discovery. One of the several suits of clothes had fallen from its hook, and when he reached down to prevent it from interfering with the closing of the door he found that the bottom board of the piece of furniture was loose.

Laying the fallen suit aside, he lifted it. Underneath there was an enclosed space of a few inches in depth. At the farther end his groping hand came in contact with a leather bag lying flat. When he tried to lift it, it was so heavy that he had to take both hands.

Taken from its hiding place and opened upon the floor, the case contained nothing to throw light upon Landis' loss; still, its contents were surprising. First, wrapped in a chamois skin, there were two large caliber automatics, new, well oiled and with the magazines filled with cartridges. Next came a larger piece of leather which served as a wrapping for a set of tools, drills, files, steel saws, cut-nippers, pliers, a bunch of objects that he took to be skeleton keys, and, lastly a short steel bar drawn to a chisel-end at either extremity and beautifully tempered; each piece looking to be as new and unused as the automatics.

Having, as he believed, plenty of time at his disposal, Markham drew up a chair and sat down to consider his prize thoughtfully. Of course, there was no doubt as to its nature. It was a complete kit of burglar's tools, with the guns to back it up, a spare kit, as it appeared, since there was every indication that the tools had never been used or the guns fired. What was Canby, figuring as an energetic young promoter intent upon making Carthage grow, doing with a burglar's kit hidden in his wardrobe?

During the four days in which he had been quietly pursuing his investigations Markham had found the circumstantial evidence, based on clews revealed the morning following the robbery, gradually losing its hold. Apart from the fact that Betty Lawson had demonstrated, or had seemed to demonstrate, her innocence of any part in the robbery, Markham was reluctantly compelled to admit that, up to the present moment, he had discovered nothing upon which to hang an assumption of Canby's guilt. Moreover, if Betty were innocent, her acquittal necessarily cleared the young promoter, since the two were together from the close of the theater performance up to and including the return to the Lawson house. Yet here was this burglar's kit, cunningly hidden in Canby's bedroom, to muddy a pool of his thoughts.

Deep in a maze of dubiety, Markham restrapped the bag and returned it to its hiding place. Clearly, the first thing to do was to tell Ormsbury of his discovery. Possibly the hotel manager might be able to indicate the next step to be taken. In replacing the bag he tried to leave everything just as he found it, rearranging the fallen suit of clothes so that it might appear as if it had not been disturbed, and turning the key in the lock of the wardrobe door.

Five minutes later he was handing the passkey to Ormsbury and congratulating himself upon an exceedingly narrow escape. For, as he emerged from the elevator he had seen Canby getting his own proper key from the clerk.

"If I had delayed a few minutes longer," Markham said to Ormsbury, "he would have caught me red-handed!"

Ormsbury grinned. "It would have served you right. I don't quite see how you could have ducked out of it."

"Neither do I. At the same time, I found something that needs an explanation quite as much as my presence in Canby's rooms would have, if he had found me there."

"What was the something?"

"A pair of man-size automatics wrapped up in a complete outfit of burglar's tools, hidden under the bottom board in Canby's wardrobe."

Detroit Lakes—The Red River Valley Dairymen's Association, which is one of the oldest of the valleywide agricultural organizations, will have its twenty-eighth annual meeting at Crookston November 16 and 17.

Ely—A proposal to issue $200,000 in bonds for public improvements to relieve unemployment was decisively defeated at a special election here. The issues were for building or improving the water and light plants, maintenance of public parks and maintenance of the public cemetery.

Winona—More than 100 of the 255 candidates for seats in the next Minnesota legislature session have pledged themselves to work and vote for legislation to rid the upper Mississippi river of polution, George Beck of Winona, secretary of the Clean Mississippi River committee of the Minnesota Izaak Walton League announced.

Duluth—Forty years ago the first iron ore from the mines of northern Minnesota was brought to the Head of the Lakes. On Oct. 18, 1892, a car of ore mined at Mountain Iron mine, near Virginia, was brought to Duluth, attached to a passenger train, while 10 cars of ore mined at the mine was dumped at the Allquez docks in Superior.

Hibbing—Mr. and Mrs. Alex Heitala and a son recently were driving to their home when, without warning, a bull moose jumped on top of their automobile, coming to rest on Mrs. Heitala's lap. Passing motorists were called to help extricate the moose.

Blooming Prairie—The three lower grades of the Blooming Prairie public schools were ordered closed for an indefinite period as the result of action taken by the board of education. The move was made by the board in a special session following the discovery of a case of infantile paralysis.

Quicker Relief For Headaches

Because of Quick Dissolving Property BAYER ASPIRIN Starts "Taking Hold" 3 or 4 Minutes After Taking

Due to important, scientific developments in the world-famous Bayer laboratories, almost INSTANT relief from headaches, neuralgia and rheumatic pains is being afforded millions.

Because of a unique process in making and tableting, Genuine Bayer Aspirin is made to dissolve almost INSTANTLY in the stomach. Hence it starts to work almost instantly. And thus "takes hold" of the average pain or headache in as little as three or four minutes after taking. The fastest, safe relief, it is said, ever known for pain.

Remember, it is Genuine Bayer Aspirin which provides this unique, quick-acting property. So be sure you get the Real Article—GENUINE BAYER Aspirin when you buy. Naturally you want the fastest, possible relief—and that's the way to get it.

To identify the genuine, see that any box or bottle of aspirin you buy is clearly marked "Genuine Bayer Aspirin." And that any tablet you take is stamped clearly with the name "Bayer" in the form of a cross. Remember—Genuine Bayer Aspirin cannot harm the heart.

NO TABLETS ARE GENUINE BAYER ASPIRIN WITHOUT THIS CROSS

Garden Varieties

Little Thelma Jane, on hearing the grownups speak of the old fashioned flowers in her mother's garden, was impressed by the names of the various vines and plants.

Two of her aunts came for a visit. After lunch she asked them to go with her and see the flowers. When they reached the garden, she called out:

"Oh, Aunt Alma, come over here and see the holly-hops; they are in gloom, and over on this side is foxetria."

Heavy-Duty Pencil

Made entirely of graphite, a pencil that is claimed to outlast a dozen of the common variety has been introduced. The point is unbreakable, its makers assert. No wood is used. As many as twenty copies can be made at a time, so strongly may the user bear down. The pencil may be sharpened with a knife or sandpaper, but not in a pencil sharpener.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

India's Oldest Man 129

The title of "India's oldest man" is claimed by Sadhu Kalyandas Ramdas of Kurali. He is one hundred and twenty-nine, and can remember events 115 years ago. Sadhu is a devotee of Vishnu. He recalls the fall of the last Peshwa, hereditary head of the Maratha state, in 1817.

Fifty and Fit

A MAN is as old—or as young—as his organs.

At fifty, you can be in your prime.

Why go along with "fairly good health" when you might be enjoying vigor you haven't felt for years?

There's a simple little thing anyone can do to keep the vital organs stimulated, and feel fit all the time. People don't realize how sluggish they've grown until they've tried it. The stimulant that will stir your system to new life is Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin. It will make a most amazing difference in many ways.

This famous doctor's prescription is a delicious syrup made with fresh herbs, active senna, and pure pepsin. It starts its good work with the first spoonful. That's all you need to drive away the dullness and headache of a bilious spell, and rid the system of that slow poison that saps your strength. It's better than a tonic for tired bowels, and unlike habit-forming laxatives you can take it freely or give it to any child. And it isn't expensive.

Get some syrup pepsin today, and take a little tonight. Don't wait until you're sick to give your system this wonderful help. You can avoid those spells of biliousness or constipation. A spoonful every now and then is better than constant worry about the condition of your bowels, or fear of auto-intoxication as you grow older. Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin protects the system. All druggists keep this preparation.

Shark Got Half "Catch"

As far as the records go, Ernest Pilman of Nantucket is the only man on the island who caught half a bluefish. Already having caught five, Pilman felt a mighty tug on his line and was positive he had hooked a big fellow. When he pulled it up on the shore he found he had hooked the front half of a bluefish. A shark had apparently made a grab for the bluefish after it took the hook and had bitten it off amidships as clean as though cut with a knife.

Device Tests Lobsters

An electrical device, developed by a professor at Boston university, will determine whether a lobster is fit to eat or not. The device was adopted by the Massachusetts fish and game department. If the lobster does not contract its tail or move its clippers at the shock, it will be thrown away.

ICE AGE SAW END OF GIANT BEAVER

Huge Castoroide Victim of Own Appetite.

The first men in North America may have encountered an animal capable of cutting down forests and building big wooden houses.

This creature was the castoroide, a relative of the beaver, but approximately ten times the size of the present animal, according to a report made to the American Society of Mammalogists by Alvin H. Cahn of the University of Illinois, who has traced the distribution of the skeletal remains of the creature over a great part of the continent. This giant which weighed approximately 500 pounds and had teeth 6 inches long, apparently disappeared at about the close of the last Ice age, when man is believed to have made his appearance. His range seems to have been concentrated in the Middle West, although a partial skeleton has been found as far away as Alaska.

The great creature must have been monarch of all it surveyed, Cahn believes, yet after attaining great numbers it became extinct quite suddenly. This may be explained, he thinks, because of its great specialization and enormous appetite. It apparently had the same habits as the modern beaver.

"The present-day animal," he points out, "has a heavy bulky body. Its legs are short, it is clumsy on land, and has great difficulty in going over the rough terrain which marks the country where it lives because of the very qualities which make it so successful as an aquatic animal. How much greater difficulty must castoroides have had in leaving the water!

"A modern beaver colony of ten individuals will cut down from 50 to 75 trees a year in order to live, and the bulk of its food is limited to two species of trees. Those trees are cut which, when felled, will be available to the animal from the water. Hence the time must come when the beaver must leave the water in order to obtain food.

"The animals must then go inland for trees or migrate, and this migration may well be an overland journey of great difficulty. Imagine, then, a colony of ten castoroides, weighing 500 pounds instead of 50 pounds each. If a beaver cuts down 50 trees a year, how many hundred would a castoroide have to cut in the same time in order to persist? How much quicker must he have been forced to make land excursions for food.

"Then would come the time of forced land marches which the bulk and structure of the great beaver would have rendered almost prohibitive. Some slight change in the physiography of the country would easily explain its extermination.

There is no evidence, he points out, that the first men on the continent ever came in contact with the great beast or in any way helped in its extermination. There was no huge flesh-eating animal which could have made great inroads on it.

The creature is believed to have built houses, like the modern beaver, but these must have been rather imposing stuctures. One partial skeleton is claimed to have been found inside a "house" made of 3-inch wood 8 feet square and 4 feet high. But this would not have been big enough to hold the owner, Cahn points out.

Mass for Vanished City

Memorial services were held recently on the cliffs in Suffolk, a short distance from the vanished port and cathedral city of Dunwich, a nursery of Christianity in eastern Britain, where a bishopric was founded in 630.

By the middle of the Eleventh century Dunwich had already suffered from the inroads of the sea upon the coast, which later caused its total ruin. The Benedictines, Franciscans, and Dominicans all maintained establishments there, but only a few relics now remain, including the ivy-covered walls of the Franciscan.—London Times.

What a famous clinic discovered about this amazing Baby Food!

ORIGINATED 75 YEARS AGO . . . NEVER SURPASSED IN DIGESTIBILITY . . . EAGLE BRAND NOW PROVED IDEAL FOOD IN PHYSICIANS' TEST WITH 50 BABIES.

● ● ●

WHEN Gail Borden originated Eagle Brand back in 1857, he did so because there was a crying need for a pure, safe milk for babies. No one knew then what we know now of food values. No thorough scientific research had as yet been made in infant feeding.

Yet, amazing though it seems, this baby food created by Gail Borden proved so remarkable in its nutritive value and in its digestibility that it has survived 75 years of revolutionary discoveries in nutrition—has raised three generations of splendid babies—and today, in as thorough a test as was ever given to a baby food, has proved itself unsurpassed in baby building!

Today, Eagle Brand is hailed as a most modern baby food—second to none in its scientific proof of performance.

How the test was made

Recently, two famous baby specialists conducted a feeding test with fifty average babies. For months, Eagle Brand was the only food these babies received, except for the supplementary foods* now given with mother's milk or any milk. X-rays were taken of their bones. Blood counts were made. Tooth development was watched. Heights, weights, strength were recorded. And all these records were compared with records of other groups fed on other baby foods.

At last came the verdict. In every way, the comparison was favorable to Eagle Brand. For those Eagle Brand babies showed themselves superbly nourished. This simple diet—Eagle Brand with the usual supplementary foods*—was wanting in nothing that a baby needs for health, growth. Your grocer has Eagle Brand. See directions on label.

● ● ●

*The usual supplementary foods, of course, are orange or tomato juice, and cod liver oil or other source of the anti-rachitic vitamin D.

P. B. Malberg

Candidate for
JUDGE of PROBATE
Marshall County, Minn.

To the Voters of Marshall County, Minnesota:

Once more I come to the voters and ask for their vote. I am a candidate for the office of Judge of Probate and no honest person will say that I am not qualified for that office, and I sincerely ask friends and voters for their support, and their vote.

If you elect me, you can depend on me to do what is right, at the right time, and at the least expense, and be of some help to those that need help, and there will be only one Malberg on the County payroll.

I have lived in this County now 52 years and have paid taxes for more than 45 years in this County, and I have been interested in County, Town and school affairs since 1886, and none of my political opponents have dared to come out in the open and charge that I ever did anything but what was right either in or out of office. But quiet whisperings and wise-cracks of all kinds, and new tricks, are being used to keep Malberg away from the County Seat.

Promoters and grafters are always on the job, all the time, and more so at election time.

The few years that I had some say in County affairs there was no tax money wasted on either road or ditch projects.

If my policies had been followed the tax burden would have been less. It is now time to stop spending on high when incomes are down on low.

My aim shall be, to be of service to the people of Marshall County. I am free to do justice to all without fear or favor. I am thankful for all past favors, and if elected, I shall try my very best to conduct the office and myself so that you will not regret that you helped to elect me.

Your support, and vote will be sincerely appreciated.

Yours truly,

The story of how the farmers of this section were forced to accept useless drainage projects at a cost that often amounted to confiscation of their lands, is familiar to everyone. You farmers in particular, who rose in vain revolt by the hundreds, will not soon forget it.

Since that time it has been decided to restore Thief Lake and undo some of the harm in that section. I have nothing against this project, but I would like to quote public records showing how this land, much of it acquired thru tax default and riparian rights, has brought in the following amounts to owners thru restoration:

State of Minnesota Auditor's warrants issued to the Clerk of the District Court of Marshall County, Minn., for Julius J. Olson and others in the Thief Lake Restoration project, to wit:

May 31, 1931	$50,552.49
July 24, 1931	$51,853.10
October 8, 1931	$8,000.00
Total	$110,405.59

THESE FIGURES SPEAK FOR THEMSELVES

The dam at the outlet cost in excess of $200,000 which brings the project, including the original drainage costs of about two million, to a rather high figure.

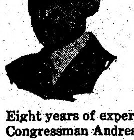
"Agriculture's Key Man"



RE-ELECT
August H. Andresen
Republican of Red Wing
TO CONGRESS

Eight years of experience in Congress have already placed Congressman Andresen on record for Economy in government; Equality and protection of agriculture; Conservation of our resources and wild life; a square deal for labor and an equal opportunity for independent business. He is Minnesota's only member on the powerful Committee on Agriculture in Congress and in line for the Chairmanship. He has led the fight for increased tariffs on farm products to protect American farmers from cheap foreign competition. He is Honest, Efficient and Experienced, and will continue to fight for Minnesota.

The Big Election

Another big election has come and gone and as far as we know both candidates and voters on winning and losing sides have stood the gaff and still alive.

It was a great election. Eighty-two voters in Holt turned out to cast their vote in favor of their choice candidates. The state ballot was the longest it has ever been in the history of our state. This, however, was due to the fact that 31 candidates ran at large for Representatives in Congress.

The way Holt voted:
Roosevelt (D), 47; Hoover (R), 29
Gov. Olson (FL), 54; Brown (R), 18; Regan (D), 10.
Lieut. Gov.—Solberg (FL), 44; Streissguth (R), 18.
Rep. in Legislature—Evans, 41; Green, 37.
Dist. Judge—Bishop, 31; Olson, 44.
Probate Judge — Brett, 58; Malberg, 18.

The question of changing the poor relief system from township and villages to county system was voted on as follows:

Yes, 58; No, 6.

All four amendments to the state constitution carried in the village.

Farmer-Labor Landslide

Floyd B. Olson

Minnesota's Farmer-Labor party, the only dominant third party in any state, shared in the triumph with the Roosevelt landslide which placed the state in the Democratic presidential column Wednesday for the first time.

Floyd B. Olson, 40-year-old governor, won his second term with a total which threatened to exceed the combined vote of his Democratic and Republican opponents, and let his party to victories in the majority of contests for other state offices.

Farmer-Laborites led the field of 31 candidates for Congress, with nine places to be filled.

Magnus Johnson, Paul J. Kvale, Henry Arens, and Ernest Lundeen, all F-L, lead; while Theo. Christianson, Rep., comes fifth. The other places are in doubt as we go to press.

ROOSEVELT WINS

Democrats Carry 42 States in Tuesday's Election

Franklin D. Roosevelt was elected president of the United States Tuesday in the greatest triumph for the forces of Democracy in the history of the country.

Roosevelt carried 42 states. Every state west of the Alleghenies went against Hoover, which includes Iowa, his birthplace, and California, his home state.

Pennsylvania, Connecticut, Delaware, New Hampshire, Vermont and Maine kept the Republican faith.

As a result of Tuesday's election, Congress will be dominantly Democratic, the exact number of seats gained being yet in doubt.

Farm Home Burns

While they were away visiting at the Guy Anderson home on Tuesday evening, Mr. and Mrs. Oscar L. Johnson had the misfortune to lose their farm home and all belongings when it was leveled to the ground by a fire which it was reported had started from an overheated stove.

Some of the men folks in the village noticed the flames and rushed out to the farm at once but were unable to save a thing as the interior of the house was all ablaze.

The Johnsons' also lost some valuable papers and $75 in cash.

Red Cross Membership Drive

The annual Roll Call of the American Red Cross will be held from Armistice Day, Nov. 11, to Thanksgiving Day, Nov. 24. The need for a large membership is greater this year thon at any time since the war. The Red Cross, thru its aid to the needy and disaster-stricken, will fill a most important place in the relief program of the nation. The appeal goes out to every American citizen and patriot to rally to the call of the "World's Greatest Morther," the Red Cross. It needs your help in the relief of the unemployed, in the flour distribution, and in clothing the needy from the cotton voted by Congress for distribution. In times of need the American people have responded nobly to the cause of giving aid to the less fortunate of their fellow-men, and it is with confidence that the Red Cross sends out its appeal for a greater and more inspired membership for the coming year.

When the local Red Cross worker calls at your home or place of business to solicit your membership, bear in mind the thousands of unfortunate men, women, and chidren who will be benefited by the sacrifice and generosity of Red Cross contributors. Let us not permit the appeal of the "The Greatest Mother in the World" to go unheeded. Your contribution may be the means of securing aid for some needy and unfortunate family.

The soliciters for this community will be Gladys Sanoden and Beaulah Bennes. Lay aside your membership fee and contribution now and they will be glad to give you a button and membership card when they call at your home or place of business.

SCHOOL NOTES

HIGH SCHOOL

The High School has been very fortunate because only five in our classes have the measles.

We are having a good time now in English III listening to the jokes and riddles which we have to tell for Public Speaking. If you see a Junior walking down the street waving his arms, don't think he is angry — he's just practicing public speaking.

The freshmen had a test in English on Tuesday.

In General Science we have been studying about the eye, and Mr. Nybakken asked the following question: "Why does not everything we look at look upside down as it does on the retina?" To which Clayton gave the following answer: "Because we don't know any better."

Grades I and II

The following children had 100 in Spelling last Friday: Wayne, Marian, Roy, Irene, Lillian, and Elaine.

The second grade is working on an Indian project. This week they are working by groups on Indian and Pilgrim scenes. They also have been studying Indian life and design.

The first grade, inspired by a story in their Primers, decided they would like to make a doll house and rag dolls.

Grades III, IV and V

The following children had one hundred in Spelling on Friday:

Third Grade: Morris Bottem, Ruby Werner, Romal Burtness, Betty Lou Lorentson, Lois Hanson, Rubin Ness.

Fourth Grade: Marian Olson, Jean Sorum, Myers Larson, Lorene Fluke, Orris Engebretson, Roy Hagberg.

Fifth Grade: Vernice Tollefsrud, Lila Kolden.

Grades VI, VII and VIII

We have had a large number of absences this week.

Gertrude Nohre won the Quick Thinking Contest we had Friday afternoon.

Lowell had the best paper in the 7th grade Geography check-up test Monday.

In 7th grade Grammar we have been writing original poems. Lorraine Engebretson wrote this one: A COLONIAL BOY

The Colonial boy was dressed in wool and skin
Way from his toes up to his chin.
He helped his father fish and hunt.
And never played a tricky stunt-
Like some of these young boys today
Who think of nothing but eat and play.

This one was written by Florence Bottem:

THANKSGIVING

Thanksgiving Day is coming soon—
Oh, what a feast we'll have at noon!
Turkey and pie and everything
good,
All we can eat—much more than
we should.
Then after dinner we go out and play.
Oh, won't it be a jolly day!

Born to Mr. and Mrs. Nils O. Johnson on Thursday morning, a boy.

We got a dandy snowstorm here late Wednesday night and all day yesterday it blew about and drifted up.

The Carlson Merc. Co. are shipping out their second car of dressed turkeys this week and expect to ship the last car before Thanksgiving on Tuesday.

Deer Are Plentiful; Season Opens Tuesday

Big game hunters' alibis will have to be original this year for W. D. Stewart, state game and fish commissioner, says that there are more deer in Minnesota now than there have been in 40 years.

His comment came while an estimated army of 50,000 hunters was feverishly preparing for the opening of the big game season next Tuesday, November 15. It extends through November 25, making an eleven day period when deer may be taken legally.

"Reports from the north-woods' wardens are that deer are more plentiful than they have been since 1890," said Stewart. "The deer have multiplied due to favorable breeding coditions the last five years and because comparatively few were taken two years ago.

"During the last open season the weather was very unfavorable for hunters. There was virtually no snow and it rained a great deal of the time. This meant that hunters were handicapped in tracking and otherwise tracing the game."

Deer may be taken in these counties: Cook, Lake, St. Louis, Koochiching, Carlton, Pine, Aitkin, Cass, Hubbard, Beltrami, Lake of the Woods, Mahnomen, Clearwater, Becker, Roseau, Kittson, Marshall, Pennington and Red Lake. Several other counties are partly open. Bucks and does may be taken in these counties mentioned but only the bucks in Itasca county.

The state took in $116,000 in license fees in 1930. Commissioner Stewart expects the returns this year to approximate $130,000 at the rate of $2.25 for resident licenses and $50 for the non-resident permits.

Dairymen's Convention

One thousand dairy farmers, creamery operators, and others interested in the development of dairying in Northwestern Minnesota are expected to attend the Red River Valley Dairymen's convention at Crookston on November 16 and 17. An unusually strong program has been arranged, beginning with the Creamery Operators' banquet and dance on the evening of November 16, followed by the speaking program, the judging events and presentation of the awards the next day.

Speakers include A. J. Glover, editor of Hoard's Dairymen, one of the foremost in America on matters pertaining to the dairy industry; T. Arens, Assistant Commissioner, State Agriculture Dairy and Food department; A. J. McGuire, General Manager, Land O' Lakes; Axel Meyerton, president of the Northwest Creamery Owners' association, and A. D. Sibbald, editor of the Creamery operator. Mayor W. J. Kirkwood is scheduled to give the addres of welcome, with a response by Stuart McLeod of Thief River Falls, director of the Dairymen's association. Other featurers of the program include a band concert under the direction of T. W. Thorson, demonstration by Earl and Norris Engelstad, Thief River Falls, state champion 4-H Club dairy demonstration team, and special entertainment arranged by the Crookston Association of Public Affairs.

A. A. Dowell, Superintendent of the Northwest School and Experiment Station, is president of the Red River Valley Dairymens association; C. M. Pesek secretary, and Stuart McLeod, Thief River Falls; O. O. Heggeness, Detroit Lakes and H. E. Osgood, Erhard, directors.

Ten Years Through Ups and Downs

It is said what goes up must come down.

This is what happened to prices. Now that prices are down there is only one place they can go and that is up. Now is the time to have a little faith in the future and take advantage of the increases as they come along.

Through all of these ups and downs this bank has continued to serve this community. It has been tested beyond all limits and it is here to serve the people in the same old way.

The bank deeply appreciates the confidence of the people that have made it possible to weather all of these storms.

President Orders Tariff Action to Help Employment—Steel Corporation Sees Business Improvement—Doings of the Presidential Campaigners.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

FURTHER protection for American industries and American workmen against certain foreign competition may be expected in the immediate future. Some days ago Frank X. Eble, United States commissioner of customs, began a series of hearings on the complaints of manufacturers that the dumping of foreign products on our markets at ruinously low prices was threatening our industries. Mr. Eble heard the testimony of representatives of various industries and examined the foreign goods they took to Washington. He was urged to correct the evil by ordering higher import duties.

F. X. Eble

Then President Hoover, fulfilling promises made in several speeches, directed the federal tariff commission to open at once an investigation into the foreign competition that is distressing the manufacturers and causing increased unemployment in many American communities. Mr. Hoover's letter was directed to Chairman Robert L. O'Brien of the commission and appended to it was a list of sixteen industries that are being adversely affected, together with the names of the cities and towns that are injured by the influx of foreign goods. The letter said:

"You recognize that currencies in thirty countries have now depreciated from 5 to 55 per cent, which has reduced the standards of living in those countries and greatly widened the difference in cost of production between the United States and those localities.

"I would therefore be obliged if the tariff commission would expedite this matter in order to afford all possible relief to unemployment in these communities. I urge this expedition because of this possible retardation of increasing employment of our people. If it shall prove that the differences in cost of production between here and abroad in these industries have altered the basis of the tariff duties, I wish to receive recommendations of the tariff commission at the earliest possible moment."

Included in the injured industries are rag and grass rugs, brushes, leather gloves, silverware, jewelry, chemical products, electric light bulbs, cutlery, pottery, rubber boots and shoes, iron and steel products, lumber products, canned vegetables and fish and dried beans. The list was compiled by the Commerce department.

DIRECTORS of the United States Steel corporation came to the front boldly with action that indicated they could see real improvement in the business condition of the country. They voted to declare the quarterly dividend on the preferred stock, although it was not earned during the previous three months, and no margin of profit had been shown for the issue since September of last year. Payment of the dividend requires the outlay of $6,304,919, and the net loss for the quarter ending September 30 was announced as $20,871,709. But a special supplementary report was made showing gains in production since last July and still better gains in the shipments of finished steel. Three months ago the directors had warned the holders of preferred stock that continuance of the dividend payments would depend on improvement in business conditions.

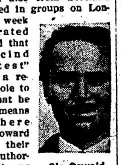
Wall Street had been tense with excitement in advance of the dividend announcement. Probably no group of men could be assembled in Wall Street whose combined opinion would be more highly respected by the financial community than the Steel directors, representing, as they do, the strongest banking interests in the country.

GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT returned to Albany from his campaign tour of the Middle West and the South with the assurances of Democratic leaders that the southern states which voted for Mr. Hoover in 1928 had definitely returned to the Democratic fold. His speaking program from this on was somewhat uncertain but probably was to include talks in Boston, New York and other eastern cities.

President Hoover made a quick trip to Indianapolis where he spoke Friday night and then hurried back to Washington to put the finishing touches on addresses to be delivered in Newark, N. J., and New York city. The latter he was said to consider one of the most important of his campaign. Some of Mr. Hoover's advisers were urging him to make another tour of the Middle West, the real battle ground; others thought he should make a big transcontinental swing that would land him at his home at Palo Alto, Calif., for election day.

Al Smith's speech in Newark, which was broadcast by radio, was listened to with intense interest. He devoted a great deal of it to the liquor issue, and that had the effect of bringing Senator Borah out into the open with the flat assertion that he would vote for Hoover, though he indicated he was not going to take part in the campaign. The Idahoan characterized Smith's address as "the most effective talk for President Hoover in this campaign."

SEVERAL hundred thousands of unemployed men from many parts of England and also from Scotland and Wales moved in groups on London during the week and concentrated there to demand that parliament rescind the "means test" which requires a recipient of the dole to furnish proof that he has no other means of support. There were few untoward incidents in their march for the authorities of the towns through which they passed provided them with food and shelter. But it was feared there might be rioting in London, so the regular police of the metropolitan district and civilian volunteers sworn in as special police, some 40,000 in all, were mobilized to keep order. This was due mainly to the fact that the Communists were active among the marchers and, as always, were eager to stir up trouble.



Sir Oswald Mosley

One of the preliminary incidents was a lively street fight between jobless men and the British Fascists organized by Sir Oswald Mosley. The millionaire baronet, addressing a meeting in the East End, had been heckled, and, at the head of his blackshirted followers, was on the way to their headquarters near the parliament buildings, followed by a jeering mob. Near Trafalgar square Sir Oswald's men broke ranks and engaged in a sharp battle with their tormentors.

During a debate in the house of commons on a motion of censure for the government's dole policy—which motion was defeated—Prime Minister MacDonald declared the means test could not be abolished but promised that some phases of the policy would be reconsidered. These, he said, might include the items of pensions and savings, which under the present arrangements must be spent before an unemployed person is eligible to receive benefits.

NEITHER the French nor the British government wishes to take up the matter of the war debts to the United States until after the Presidential election. The French chamber of deputies voted to postpone the debate on the question by deciding to give prior consideration to domestic matters. Several days previously Premier Herriot had indicated that France intended to pay an installment on its debt on December 15, but it was revealed that no provision for such a payment had been made in the French budget.

Questioners in the house of commons tried to learn the British government's intentions regarding the American debt, but Neville Chamberlain refused to say anything definite.

One Conservative asked Chamberlain to promise there would be no payment until the house had debated the matter, but he replied that he was "not in a position at present" to discuss the matter. Other members jumped up to ask further questions, but the chancellor refused to answer.

WHEN the assembly of the League of Nations meets in special session the third week in November to consider the Manchurian problem and the Lytton report, both Japan and China will be well represented. Yosuke Matsuoka will be chief spokesman for Japan, and he and his two colleagues will be in Geneva with a free hand to act as they deem wise. They may even decide that their country must withdraw entirely from the league.

Dr. Yuen-Li Liang

Chief representative of the Chinese Nationalist government will be Dr. Yuen-Li Liang, who passed through the United States recently on his way to Geneva, stopping briefly in Washington. He was formerly judge of the Shanghai court of appeals and is a finished diplomat and a strong debater.

The line of strategy Matsuoka will follow is indicated by his statement: "I will talk to the league as though talking to God. I will tell what I think is just and will let it go at that. I will not deal with men; I will deal with God. God transcends all racial hatreds and understands any language. If the league can also face God and do what it thinks is for the ultimate good of humanity I am satisfied."

IT WAS announced in London by the India office that the third Indian round table conference would open in London about the middle of November and probably would continue until the Christmas holidays. Neither Mahatma Gandhi nor any member of the All-India Congress party is to be among the Indian delegates unless the preliminary list already issued is enlarged. Nor will there be any women delegates. Several princes will attend but most of those rulers will be represented by their prime ministers. The conference sessions will be in the building of the house of lords and Mr. MacDonald will act as chairman.

ITALY has been busy celebrating the end of the first decade of Fascism, and Premier Mussolini has been making interesting addresses in Turin, Milan and other cities. The Turinese have been the most active of the Duce's opponents, but he moved among thousands of workers in factories without escort and made proffers of peace to them, urging them to join the Fascist party. Then, in an outdoor speech heard by half a million, the premier put forth a plea to the United States to cancel or reduce the European war debts. Continuing with international matters, he declared Germany's demand for armament parity was fully justified but that the Germans must wait until the world disarmament conference breaks up in what he predicted would be failure. He said Italy would remain a member of the League of Nations because "the league is very sick and we cannot abandon it."

Without mentioning France by name he made what was interpreted by the crowd as a challenge to that nation—whose frontier is only 40 miles west of there—in his statement that "Turin has never been afraid of war."

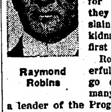
After being banqueted in Turin by Crown Prince Humbert and his bride, the Duce went on to Milan where he predicted that within ten more years all Europe would go Fascist and that before the end of the century Italy would again be the leader of civilization.

The premier said there was no need to waste time reviewing the past or thinking of it—that his thought always was for the future.

"In these days of unrest and uncertainty elsewhere in the world there are countries far older than this which do not know what their future will be. We know. We are sure of our future and are advancing always straight ahead with courage and determination."

He expressed the opinion that sometimes his words were misunderstood abroad, adding: "I am desirous of peace and tranquillity, but I also am anxious for new battles and fresh combats."

SINCE Raymond Robins dropped out of sight on September 3 not a clew to the whereabouts of the noted Chicago reformer, philanthropist and publicist has been found. His friends cannot understand how a man of such prominence could thus disappear and have now renewed the search for him. However, they fear that he was slain and not merely kidnaped as was at first believed.



Raymond Robins

Robins was a powerful figure in Chicago civic affairs for many years. He was a leader of the Progressive party and in 1914 was its candidate for United States senator from Illinois. He has a home in Maine and another in Florida. Leading people of the country were his friends. He was a noted orator, a temperance worker and a supporter of prohibition, but never was known as a snooper, his friends say, although he waged war on bootleggers in the Florida county where he resided.

That Florida rum runners might have waylaid him in New York seemed improbable to many, but it is the only theory of his disappearance his friends have. They think a powerful syndicate, having bases in Florida and New York, may be responsible.

COL. AND MRS. CHARLES LINDbergh have announced that their second son has been named Jon Morrow Lindbergh. The Jon was chosen for a Scandinavian forbear of Colonel Lindbergh, and Morrow in honor of Mrs. Lindbergh's father, the late Dwight W. Morrow. Probably the family will call the baby Jon, those close to the Lindbergh household said.

The family nurse, Betty Gow, returned from Scotland, and was whisked away to the Morrow home in Englewood, N. J., in a station wagon.

LED by Acting Mayor McKee, the board of estimate of New York decided that the project for the Thirty-eighth street tunnel under the Hudson river must be abandoned for the period of the depression. It asked the Reconstruction Finance corporation not to lend the port authority money for the project until the city has a chance to be heard; and it unofficially warned the port authority that if it tried to go ahead with the scheme they could not allow any streets to be dedicated to the tunnel approach.

IN A Navy day message to the nation President Hoover took occasion to warn the powers of Europe that, if current negotiations for effecting further reductions in world armaments fail, the United States will build up its navy to the full strength permitted by the London treaty.

Scientists on Trail of Fire Secrets of Indians

One of the oldest scientific mysteries, the reputed ability of savage priests and medicine men to make themselves immune to fire, is to be investigated this summer by agents of the Smithsonian institution. Dr. Truman Michelson, of that institution, has been studying the sacred beliefs and folk-lore of the Fox tribe of Indians in Iowa. Among this lore he found the habit of medicine men conducting certain ceremonies to plunge their bare arms into boiling water or to take up and handle burning firebrands. Educated members of the Fox tribe ascribe this trick to the previous bathing of the hands and arms in the juice of an unnamed weed which grows profusely in the prairie country. The juice, it is believed, protects the skin temporarily against heat.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Safe Pleasant Way To Lose Fat

How would you like to lose 15 pounds of fat in a month and at the same time increase your energy and improve your health?

How would you like to lose your double chin and your too prominent hips and at the same time make your skin so clean and clear that it will compel admiration?

Get on the scales today and see how much you weigh—then get a bottle of Kruschen Salts which will last you for 4 weeks and costs but a trifle. Take one-half teaspoonful in a glass of hot water before breakfast every morning—cut down on pastry and fatty meats—go light on potatoes, butter, cream and sugar—and when you have finished the contents of this first bottle weigh yourself again.

Now you will know the pleasant way to lose unsightly fat and you'll also know that the 6 salts of Kruschen have presented you with glorious health.

But be sure for your health's sake that you ask for and get Kruschen Salts. Get them at any drugstore in the world and if the results one bottle brings do not delight you—do not joyfully satisfy you—why money back.

SYNOPSIS

Owen Landis, young inventor, in the little town of Carthage, has developed an extraordinary "silencer," which is stolen from a safe in his laboratory. Landis tells Wally Markham, his chum, the only person, beside himself, knowing the combination of the safe, is Betty Lawson, daughter of a college professor, with whom the inventor is in love. Markham takes a plaster cast of a woman's footprint, found beneath the window of the laboratory, and takes an opportunity to fit it to one of Betty's shoes. They are identical. Betty tells Markham Herbert Canby, a stranger, posing as a "promoter," had driven her home the previous night, and that she had dozed in the car. Markham does not tell Landis of his discovery. Vaguely suspicious of Canby's honesty, he searches his hotel room, in his absence, finding two loaded automatic revolvers and a complete set of burglar's tools.

—4—

"The devil you say! Bert Canby a burglar?" Ormsbury ejaculated. "That's ridiculous, Wally. I grant you anything you care to charge him with in the blue-sky field; he is burglarizing the community pocketbook to the queen's taste in the promotion schemes. But he doesn't need a cracksman's kit to do that. What did you do with it?"

"I put it back where I had found it. It is up to you to rediscover it, if you want to. I don't know how it got there, or what use, if any, he means to make of it; but it's there."

"But see here, Wally; perhaps—"

What the manager was about to say was left unsaid, for at that moment the office door opened to admit the promoter himself; and the leather case he laid upon Ormsbury's desk was the one Markham had so lately restored to its hiding place.

"Hello, Markham!" Canby exclaimed cheerfully. "Glad to find you here. Two witnesses are better than one, any day in the week." Then to Ormsbury, "A few minutes ago, as I was putting my grip away upstairs, I found that thing hidden in the bottom of my wardrobe. It isn't any of mine, so I'm turning it in."

"What is it?" Ormsbury asked.

"Search me; I haven't opened it. Wouldn't, you know, not without witnesses. It may be an infernal machine, for all I know."

"Suppose you open it, John, and let us see what it is," Markham suggested.

Ormsbury unbuckled the straps and spread the contents of the bag on his desk. Canby's astonishment was either real or faultlessly simulated.

"Well—I'll be d—d!" he burst out. "Wouldn't that set your back teeth on edge? Who do you suppose planted that outfit on me?"

"Where did you say it was?" queried Ormsbury, sparring for time.

"Under the bottom of my wardrobe. The bottom board is loose, and when I opened the door to put my grip away, I saw that one leg of the trousers had got caught under the loose board, and when I picked the clothes up, the board came with 'em. And there in one corner, was this thing. What is it—a plant, or a joke?"

Markham was watching Canby narrowly as he talked, but his open-eyed frankness was as convincing as it was disarming.

"If it is a joke, somebody must have a badly distorted sense of humor," Markham put in. "It strikes me that the point of a joke like that would be rather hard to discover."

"Oh, I don't know," Canby returned, with an easy laugh. "There are still a few standpatters in Carthage who are calling me all the hard names they can dig out of the dictionary. I don't doubt some of them would be ready to shout, 'I told you so!' if I should be caught with a burglar's kit in my possession. It's up to you, now, Ormsbury. What will you do with the stuff?"

"I suppose I ought to turn it over to the police," he said, half doubtfully.

"That would be the part of a good law-abiding citizen," Canby agreed. "On the other hand, though, it would earn a good bit of unpleasant publicity for the hotel, wouldn't it?"

"It would," Ormsbury admitted with a wry smile. "I guess I'll lock the bag up in the hotel vault for the time being, and wait to see what, if anything, develops."

"That is sensible. Meanwhile, I'll keep an eye out for the joker—if it is a joke."

"Well, what do you make of it, John?" Markham asked, after Canby had gone.

"Just what you did, I imagine. The fact that he brought the stuff here to me clears him. But that isn't all. You remember the series of burglaries we had last winter, don't you. At the time they were going on, we had a man and a woman who was registered as his wife in Suite Three-Sixteen—Canby's room. About the time when the town got desperate and called in a well-known detective agency to work with the local police, the couple vanished—disappeared between two days."

"And you think the man was the burglar?"

"I've always had a sneaking idea that he might have been—and had nothing to tie it to. This hidden tool kit knocks out the doubt, doesn't it?"

Still holding a mental reservation or two on his own part, Markham said, "Well, I suppose that clears up the mystery," and got up to go.

"Not quite," Ormsbury smiled. "It doesn't tell me why you wanted to break into Canby's room in his absence."

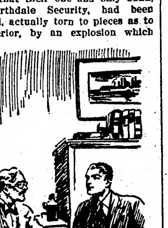
"I had a notion which now seems so foolish that I'd like to keep it to myself," Markham pleaded; and he had climbed into his car and was driving home before he recalled an incident, the significance of which he had entirely missed at the moment, namely Canby's mention of the fact that a trousers' leg of the fallen suit of clothes had been caught under the loose board, and had so been the means of disclosing the hiding place of the burglar's kit. "By George!" thought Markham. "I wonder if that was his way of telling us, or me, that he knew somebody had been prying around in his diggings. I wonder!"

But the wonder became unimportant when, as he was passing the Landis house he saw Owen waving a newspaper as a signal for him to stop.

"It's come at last, just as I said it would!" Owen said, passing the newspaper to Markham. "Read that!"

Markham read the news item to which Landis was pointing.

"At an early hour this morning the inhabitants of the quiet village of Perthdale were electrified by the discovery that their one and only bank, the Perthdale Security, had been wrecked, actually torn to pieces as to its interior, by an explosion which should have rocked the town to its foundations. A charge of explosives heavy enough entirely to demolish the bank vault, to make junk of the fittings and furnishings and to shatter every window in the building had been fired some time during the night, the perpetrators of the robbery getting away with cash and negotiable securities amounting to over $50,000.



"The Devil You Say! Bert Canby a Burglar?"

"The singular thing about the bold robbery is the fact that the crash of the terrific explosion was not heard, even by persons sleeping directly across the street from the bank, nor by either of the town's two night watchmen. The theory is that some new explosive, noiseless in its operation, was used by the robbers, and every effort is being made to ascertain if such an explosive is known to science."

"Here's where we get action!" Markham snapped. "Jam a few things into a grip and tell your family they needn't look for you back until they see you. I'll do the same and come around for you in a jiffy. If we spin the wheels we can be in Perthdale before dark. The 'noiseless explosion' settles it, doesn't it?"

"No question about that. These yeggs had my box and used it."

"Right! Hustle your make-ready or I'll beat you to it. Time is the essence of the thing. We want to hit the trail while it's warm. I'm gone!"

And with a roar of its powerful motor the roadster shot away.

CHAPTER V

An Obstacle Race

Markham spun the wheels on the run to Perthdale to such good purpose that it was only a little after dark when the blue roadster turned in at the yard of the country-town tavern.

Delaying only long enough to wash off the dust of the long drive, Markham and Landis went to the dining room. There was little to be gathered from the excited discussion of the mysterious bank robbery. The majority opinion gravitated toward the belief that some new and noiseless explosive must have been used.

"Everybody's up in the air, naturally," Markham commented as they were leaving the dining room. "We'll find somebody who isn't too excited to talk sensibly; somebody who can give us a little real information. I'll ask in the office." And when he came out, "Stockwell, president of the bank, is our man; lives just around the corner. We'll go and hear what he has to say."

They found the banker easily approachable—the more easily after Markham had introduced himself as the son of a banker.

"We saw the account in an Indianapolis paper, so Mr. Landis and I drove over to get the facts at first-hand," Markham explained. "If these bandits have got hold of something new, there ought to be a concerted effort made to run them down before they wreck us all."

"Glad to give you the facts, but they are meager, thus far," was the ready reply. "At about three o'clock, Biggers, one of our two town night watchmen, saw an auto come in from the east, and he supposed it was merely a belated tourist's car passing through, as quite possibly it was. A little later he saw the car standing in the street opposite the bank, and a man had the hood open and appeared to be doing something to the motor. The next time he walked his beat, which was about an hour later, the auto was gone and the bank was a wreck."

"And he had heard nothing in the meantime?" Markham queried.

"Not a sound; and neither did anyone else, so far as we can learn. An explosion that ought to have aroused everybody within the town limits didn't arouse anybody."

"It was the watchman who discovered the robbery?"

"Yes. Passing the bank on his later rounds he found broken glass all over the sidewalk; the front windows had been blown out. He gave the alarm and came and called me. I could hardly believe my eyes when I saw what had been done. The interior of the building is a complete wreck, showing that an enormous charge of explosive must have been used. Even the concrete walls are shattered."

"This auto that the watchman saw," Markham went on; "has there been any effort made to trace it?"

"We have done what we could. Nothing definite has come of it. The roads are full of cars coming and going at all hours of the day and night. We couldn't very well authorize indiscriminate arrests on a mere suspicion. All we could do was to try to trace a car which had, presumably, passed through Perthdale at a certain hour of the night. Such a car has been found and traced, but the occupants, three business men of Louisville, on their way to look at a western mine, were able to give a perfectly clean bill of health."

"You say this car fitted the watchman's description?" Landis put in. "Where was it seen last?"

"At Terre Haute—passing through at about seven this morning. The three men had breakfast there, and that is where they were questioned. As I say, they produced a clean bill of health and had the documents to show for it."

"You got this by wire?"

"Over long distance, from the sheriff. He said the men laughed and invited him to search them and their car. Said they hadn't robbed a bank, yet, but they might need to before they got through with their mining venture."

As they left the banker's house, Markham said, "Well, what do you think, Owen? Are we on the trail of your black box?"

"There isn't the slightest doubt, in my mind. Wally, I've simply invented a new horror, and these scoundrels, whoever they are, are using it. God only knows what they'll do next!"

"What about this Terre Haute clew—which seems to be no clew at all?"

"I've been thinking about that. While Mr. Stockdale was talking it struck me all at once that those three men might have been running a bold bluff. It would be the cleverest way of throwing everybody off the track."

"That's so," Markham acquiesced; and then, abruptly, "Are you good for an all-night drive, Owen?"

"Anything to get action."

"All right; we'll go. It's a long chance, but it seems to be about the only one. We can take turns driving and manage a bit of sleep that way. It will probably prove a wild-goose chase, but we'll make it."

Accordingly, half an hour later, the blue car took the road again, following the trail to the westward. Driving and sleeping by turns they reached Terre Haute early in the morning and Markham ordered all the morning papers. When they came, they both went through them painstakingly, and found nothing. If the Perthdale exploit had been repeated elsewhere, the news had not reached the press wires.

"Rather leaves us up in the air, doesn't it?" Markham remarked. "Assuming that the three men we have traced this far are the Perthdale bank wreckers—and that's stretching the probabilities a good bit—we don't know which way they went from here. I suppose there is nothing for it but to wait until the lightning strikes again somewhere."

"With the weapon they've got, the bandits who are using it won't stop with the looting of a single country-town bank."

"You still think they have your black box?"

"There can't be a doubt, in the light of what we learned in Perthdale."

"We'll hunt up the sheriff who telephoned Mr. Stockwell. Maybe he can tell us which way the men in the black touring car went from here."

As it turned out, the sheriff couldn't tell them the thing they needed to know, though he could, and did, give them a fairly good description of the three, coupling it with advice of a discouraging nature.

"You fellows are barking up the wrong tree," was the form the advice took. "I put those men through the mill yesterday morning and they came clean—clean as a hound's tooth. Why, they gave me the addresses of a dozen prominent people in Louisville, and offered to stop over while I wired about 'em!"

"You didn't wire, did you?" Landis put in.

What Can You Do For The Pains Of Rheumatism ?

Pain Ended In Few Minutes, This Way

It has now been discovered by thousands of rheumatic sufferers that the pains of that distressing disorder can be eased in as little as a few minutes . . . relief and comfort in almost as little time as it takes to tell!

Doctors advise two tablets of Bayer Aspirin taken with a full glass of water. Then a rest of a few minutes . . . and that is all. Pain is eased quickly—sometimes almost unbelievably.

Relief comes so fast because of the peculiar quick-dissolving property of Genuine Bayer Aspirin. The tablets you take dissolve almost INSTANTLY in your stomach. And thus you get practically instant relief. The fastest, safe relief—it is said.

TAKE 2 BAYER ASPIRIN TABLETS
DRINK ONE FULL GLASS OF WATER

Remember it is Genuine Bayer Aspirin which claims this quick-dissolving, quick-acting property. So be careful that you get the real article when you buy. See that any box or bottle you purchase is clearly marked "Genuine Bayer Aspirin." And that any tablet you take has the name "Bayer" stamped on it in the form of a cross. Then you will get quick relief.

Remember that when you buy. And remember, too, that Genuine Bayer Aspirin Does Not Harm the Heart.

Soldier Husband Freed by "Patriotic" Suicide

One of the essentials of military patriotism is the hero. A campaign without heroes will not take long to exhaust the public interest. Yet the rounding up and shooting down of bandits by forces superior in equipment, supplies and organization is not likely to provide a sufficiency of heroes for the stimulation of the masses. Fortunately for the moral effect of the Manchurian campaign on Japan, a woman leaped into the breach.

On the eve of his departure for Manchuria, a lieutenant attached to the ambulance corps of the Fourth division returned home to find a note pasted to the door. It told all callers to find him at his regimental headquarters. "Hurrying into his wife's sitting room . . . he found his spouse dead in an extremely orderly manner," says the Osaka Mainichi. She had put on her best costume, written the usual note, and then cut her own throat with a dagger, "which her soldier-husband has treasured."

The note explained that her suicide would leave him free to serve the emperor without worrying about his wife. "Words fail to describe my joy to leave you before your heroic march to Manchuria tomorrow."

The affair of the "Samurai Wife" not only gave the shreik press a splendid opportunity; this female version of General Nogi's harakiri," as the pidgin papers dubbed it, set up an example of martyrdom that bids fair to burn like Latimer's candle. It has been followed by dozens of attempts at patriotic suicide.—New Statesman and Nation, London.

Plan Honor for Insect

Premier Moore of Queensland, Australia, proposes in all seriousness to erect a statue to "cactoblastus," an insect which destroys the castus and prickly pear. Cactus was spreading over millions of rich acres when the insect was imported. Now farmers are returning to lands which the plants had made unfit for crops. "The 'cactoblastus' is the savior of our state," says Moore.

Diet Didn't Do This!

HAPPY little girl, just bursting with pep, and she has never tasted a "tonic!"

Every child's stomach, liver, and bowels need stimulating at times, but give children something you know all about.

Follow the advice of that famous family physician who gave the world Syrup Pepsin. Stimulate the body's vital organs. Dr. Caldwell's prescription of pure pepsin, active senna, and fresh herbs is a mild stimulant that keeps the system from getting sluggish.

If your youngsters don't do well at school, don't play as hard or eat as well as other children do, begin this evening with Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. This gentle stimulant will soon right things! The bowels will move with better regularity and thoroughness. There won't be so many sick spells or colds. You'll find it just as wonderful for adults, too, in larger spoonfuls!

Get some Syrup Pepsin; protect your household from those bilious days, frequent headaches, and that sluggish state of half-health that means the bowels need stimulating. Keep this preparation in the home to use instead of harsh cathartics that cause chronic constipation if taken too often. You can always get Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin at any drug store; they have it all ready in big bottles.

Relief Group Named

Regulations for the distribution of $3,750 for the relief of suffering Marshall county people were adopted at a meeting of the Marshall county board of commissioners at Warren when a special relief committee with Sheriff John P. Bordewich as county worker, was named.

The county relief committee in charge of handling the special fund supplied to Marshall county by the state thru a loan granted from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation consists of J. J. Pagnac, Stephen, chairman; Ole Bergman, Alvarado; Mrs. Emil Peterson, Middle River and W. O. Braggans of Warren.

Allications for relief may be made to any member of the special committee, however, no aid will be granted without the approval of the county worker, Mr. Bordewich, the rules adopted by the committee declare.

It will not be necessary for applicants to make special trips to Warren to secure relief, as Mr. Bordewich will call an any family in the county and will make a complete investigation as to the merits of granting the relief funds. The fund is small for such a large county, therefore only those in actual need will be assisted.

The special relief money coming from the Reconsoruction Finance Corporation thru the state is designed to help children and aged people with food and clothing and only those who are unable to procure the necessities in any other manner, said Mr. Braggans in commenting on the plans. "No one can receive aid who cannont qualify for assistance under the poor laws of the state, and no doctor or hospital bills can be granted.

The fund secured for Marshall county will be all that can be secured until after January 1, and after that time if conditions are acute further requests may be made.

NOTICE OF REAL ESTATE MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE

Notice is hereby given that default has been made in the conditions of that certain mortgage dated March 20th, 1924, executed by Gerhard A. Nordvik and Marie Nordvik, his wife, as mortgagors, to the State of Minnesota, as mortgagee, filed for record in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for Marshall County, State of Minnesota, on April 16th, 1924, at 10:30 o'clock A. M., and duly recorded in Book "120" of Mortgages, on page 322 thereof; that default consists in the failure to pay the semi-annual installments of amortized principal and interest for $125.00 each, due on September 29th, 1930, March 29th, 1931, September 29th, 1931, March 29th, 1932, and September 29th, 1932, respectively; and to pay the taxes on the hereinafter described mortgaged premises; and to pay the premiums on insurance policies covering the buildings in and upon said mortgaged lands; that under the terms thereof there is actually due and claimed to be due on said mortgage, at the date hereof, the sum of $3,578.31, unamortized principal, together with interest thereon from September 29th, 1932, at the rate of five and one-fourth per cent. per annum, the sum of $625.00, amortized principal and interest, with interest on $125.00 thereof since September 29th, 1930, on $125.00 thereof since March 29th, 1931, on $125.00 thereof since September 29th, 1931, on $125.00 thereof since March 29th, 1932, and on $125.00 thereof since September 29th, 1932, each at the rate of seven per cent. per annum; the sum of $438.00 for taxes, including interest, penalties and costs, and interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum to the date hereof, and the sum of $37.07, premiums on insurance effected, including interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum to the date hereof, in all the sum of $4,735.65, including interest on said respective sums from said respective dates and at the respective rates as aforesaid; that no action or proceeding at law or otherwise has been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof; that pursuant to the power of sale in said mortgage contained, said mortgage will be foreclosed and the lands and premises therein described, lying and being in Marshall County, Minnesota, to-wit:

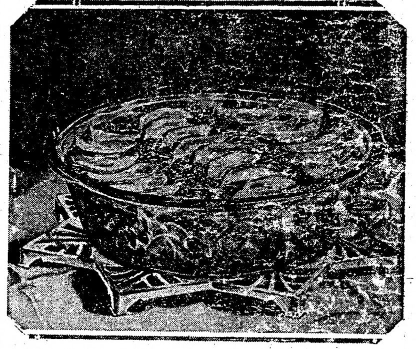
Delicious Apple Desserts



THE healthful delicious apple helps to keep winter meals properly balanced. For this fruit can be turned simply and easily into many delicious desserts. The use of the quick cooking variety of tapioca blends the fruit and other ingredients into a new deliciousness.

Deep Dish Apple Tapioca

- ⅓ cup quick cooking tapioca
- ¼ teaspoon salt
- ¼ cup molasses
- 2½ cups hot water
- 3 tart apples, thinly sliced
- 1 cup seedless raisins
- ⅓ cup sugar
- ¼ teaspoon nutmeg
- ¼ teaspoon cinnamon
- 2 tablespoons butter

Add tapioca, salt, molasses to water. Cook in double boiler 15 minutes, or until tapioca is clear, stirring frequently. Place apples in greased baking dish. Add raisins, sprinkle with sugar, nutmeg and cinnamon. Dot with butter. Add tapioca mixture. Bake in moderate oven (350°F.) 30 minutes, or until apples are tender. Serve hot or cold with lemon, maple, or hard sauce, or garnish with whipped cream. Serves 6.

• • •

Blushing Apple Tapioca

- ⅓ cup sugar
- 1½ cups water
- 2 tablespoons red cinnamon drops
- 2 tablespoons quick cooking tapioca
- 1 lemon thinly sliced
- 4 large apples, cored and pared
- 1 tablespoon lemon juice

Combine sugar, water, lemon, and cinnamon drops. Cook until cinnamon drops are dissolved, stirring constantly. Add apples and cook until tender, being careful that syrup does not boil away. Remove apples, measure syrup, and add enough water to make 1 cup. Add tapioca and cook in double boiler 15 minutes, or until tapioca is clear, stirring frequently. Remove from fire and add lemon juice. Fill apples to overflowing with tapioca mixture. Chill. Serve with whipped cream. Serves 4.

• • •

Apple Souffle

- 4½ tablespoons quick cooking tapioca
- ⅓ teaspoon salt
- 1 cup milk, scalded
- 3 egg yolks, beaten until thick and lemon-colored
- ⅓ cup sugar
- ½ tablespoon lemon juice
- 1 cup grated raw apple, or drained cooked apple pulp
- 3 egg whites, stiffly beaten

Add tapioca and salt to milk, and cook in double boiler 15 minutes, or until tapioca is clear, stirring frequently. Add sugar. Cool. Add egg yolks, lemon juice, and apple. Fold in egg whites. Bake in greased ramekins, placed in pan of hot water, in moderate oven (325°F.) 45 minutes. Serve hot with sweetened whipped cream. Serves 8.

Election Results

The results of the county ballot at the general election are: F. A. Green, pioneer county resident, defeated E. M. Evans, Middle River resident, in the race for representative in the state legislature, the final vote being 2,958 for Green and 2,564 for Evans.

Bernard B. Brett was returned to the office of Judge of the Probate court defeating P. B. Malberg, veteran Marshall county campaigner. Brett received 3,252 votes and Malberg 2,136 votes.

A. S. Rokke, dean of Marshall county officials, went down to defeat at the election after serving as commissioner in the fourth district for 20 years. C. E. Moen of Newfolden is now the new commissioner.

Marshall county voters also voted to change the poor system operation within the county from township system to the county system. The vote for the change was 2,526 and against 1,480.

Minnesota will be represented in congress during the next two years with Farmer-Laber representatives, one Democrat and three Republicans, according to the way the vote returns now stand. Magnus Johnson headed the ticket with Paul John Kvale second, Henry Arens third, Ernest Lundeen fourth, Theodore Christianson fifth, Ray P. Chase sixth, Einar Hoidale seventh, F. H. Shoemaker, eighth. Two present congressmen, Harold Knutson and Aug. Andresen are just having a merry battle for ninth place with Andreson 182 votes ahead with all but 19 precincts reported.

First Payment Made On Sugar Beet Crop

The purchasing power of many Minnesota farmers was substantially enlarged when first payments on the state's $1,500,000 sugar beet crop was made about the first part of the week. Additional benefits from beet-sugar production will be reflected in greater railroad tonnage and the stimulation of activity in a group of related industries.

The sugar-manufacturing season, the United States Beet Sugar Association reported recently, has put tens of thousands of men at work in sixteen western states. Harvesting of the beets and work in the factories have already given employment to 1,880 men in the two beet sugar manufacturing centers of Minnesota— Chaska and East Grand Forks.

Besides paying $1,500,000 to the farmers of the state, a statement by the Association said, the industry in Minnesota will expend in freight bills more than $500,000. Thirty thousand tons of coal and fifteen thousand tons of limerock is being used to manufacture sugar in Minnesota, and nearly a million square yards of cotton cloth is required for bags and filters.

In all "sugar states" of the West, the Association reported, more than $36,000,000 will be paid to farmers for their beets. More than 800,000 acres were cultivated to the crop this year and production will reach over 1,100,000 tons of pure granulated sugar.

73d Congress Will Be Busy

Taxes and tariffs, the bonus and beer will dominate the labors of the 73rd congress that was elected on November 8.

A prospective $1,000,000,000 deficit challenges the ability of legislators. The emergency tax bill produced the last night and scheduled to balance the budget has failed to do so. In fewer than five months the treasury has failen more than $500,000,000 behind in its efforts to pay the government's expenses.

There is rapidly developing pressure for enactment of a general sales tax such as a rebellious house refused last session, to endorse. Its advocates claim for the general sales tax system that it will produce tremendous revenue and that it is almost painless.

A short lame duck session of the current congress will intervene this winter between the election and the first meeting of the new congress.

It is possible that the Volstead act modificationists may in that short session achieve their objective, which is to legalize beer and wine of an alcoholic content greater than one-half of one per cent, now the legal limit.

Minnesota Butter Held Best in United States

Minnesota has the distinction of making the best butter in America, it was revealed at the National Creamery Buttermakers Association judging at Mason City, Iowa. With a state average of 94.48, Minnesota butter was shown as topping that from Wisconsin, the second state, by 36 points. A Minnesotan also captured sweepstakes in the individual senior contest. He is Walter Shriver of Sauk Center, champion buttermaker of Minnesota, a title which he has held for two consecutive years.

Aluminum and Black License Tags in 1933

The Minnesota motor vehicle license plates for 1933 will have an aluminum background and black letters, Secretary of State Mike Holm has announced. The same color scheme was used in 1930. "The aluminum and black combination is the most satisfactory we ever had," Mr. Holm says. Approximately 700,000 plates are stored in the state capitol for distribution next year.

Do Large Turkey Business

The Carlson Merc. Co., Inc., did a big business here last week when they bought and shipped out three big carloads of dressed turkeys to the big eastern markets. They shipped seventy-seven thousand pounds of dressed turkeys which in figuring the average weight would be about seven thousand birds.

The Carlson Merc. Co. will again buy for the Christmas pool starting on Monday, Nov. 28 and continue to 9 p. m. on Monday, Dec. 12. They expect as many if not more birds for the Christmas market.

The turkey raising business has grown every year and it makes it very handy for the people in the community to have a local concern buy as now when roads are bad most farmers prefer to come in with team, and a home market with highest price paid is appreciated.

About the R. F. C. Relief Fund

S. S. Easter of Minneapolis, who was appointed last week to take the place of Sheriff John P. Bordewich as county worker for the poor relief work, was a business caller here on Wednesday. Mr. Easter stated that the funds are limited and that no cash is sent out to anyone who requests help without first making an investigation as to whether or not the applicant is really in need of help from the poor fund.

The county got only $3,750 from the state through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for distribution to the poor and needy, and the money is designed to help children and aged people with food and clothing, Mr. Easter stated.

This is a small fund to cover as large a county as we have and therefore a careful study of each case is made before any help is granted as it will be given only to those who are unable to procure the necessities in any other manner.

If you should need help, call upon some township or village officer and they will notify the committee at Warren and Mr. Easter will call on you.

Ten Years Through Ups and Downs

It is said what goes up must come down.

This is what happened to prices. Now that prices are down there is only one place they can go and that is up. Now is the time to have a little faith in the future and take advantage of the increases as they come along.

Through all of these ups and downs this bank has continued to serve this community. It has been tested beyond all limits and it is here to serve the people in the same old way.

The bank deeply appreciates the confidence of the people that have made it possible to weather all of these storms.

RELIEF WORK of the AMERICAN RED CROSS

Student nurses are taught Red Cross first aid and water safety methods.

Use of trucks was donated and unemployed men distributed free Red Cross flour in many counties.

A quarter million tons of free feed was given to save the livestock of the northwest.

The American Red Cross gave unemployment relief to 3,000,000 families during winter, spring and summer of 1931-1932.

This relief included:

Red Cross flour made from Farm Board wheat, distributed free to more than 2,500,000 families.

Garden seeds to plant a quarter acre, given free to more than 315,000 families.

Food, clothing, medical aid, school lunches and milk for children and other necessities to 300,000 families, including aid in mining communities.

2,200 Red Cross Chapters participated in unemployment relief.

More than 400,000 war veterans and their families were aided by 3,118 Red Cross Chapters.

750 Red Cross public health nurses made 1,335,000 visits to aid the sick and teach health methods. Thousands of unemployed are dependent upon Red Cross nurses in times of stress.

Red Cross volunteers made 336,000 new garments for the needy.

The Red Cross also gave relief in 60 disasters during the year—several of major proportions, including floods in Mississippi and Louisiana where 50,000 persons were fed and a tornado in southeastern states where 360 persons were killed and aid was given 2,000 injured. More than $250,000 was expended by Red Cross in tornado relief.

In addition to these extraordinary demands upon its resources:

7,000,000 school children were enrolled in Junior Red Cross.

72,000 persons were enrolled as Life Savers.

69,000 persons received First Aid certificates.

38,000 persons took Home Hygiene courses.

Aid was sent in 22 disasters in insular and foreign countries.

Volunteers made 3,700,000 surgical dressings; transcribed 300,000 pages of braille; served 129,000 persons in canteens and made 54,000 motor calls.

Your membership in the annual roll call—November 11 to 24—will support this work.

Aluminum and Black License Tags in 1933

The Minnesota motor vehicle license plates for 1933 will have an aluminum background and black letters, Secretary of State Mike Holm has announced. The same color scheme was used in 1930. "The aluminum and black combination is the most satisfactory we ever had," Mr. Holm says. Approximately 700,000 plates are stored in the state capitol for distribution next year.

Do Large Turkey Business

The Carlson Merc. Co., Inc., did a big business here last week when they bought and shipped out three big carloads of dressed turkeys to the big eastern markets. They shipped seventy-seven thousand pounds of dressed turkeys which in figuring the average weight would be about seven thousand birds.

The Carlson Merc. Co. will again buy for the Christmas pool starting on Monday, Nov. 28 and continue to 9 p. m. on Monday, Dec. 12. They expect as many if not more birds for the Christmas market.

The turkey raising business has grown every year and it makes it very handy for the people in the community to have a local concern buy as now when roads are bad most farmers prefer to come in with team, and a home market with highest price paid is appreciated.

Named From Home Town

Diocletian, the Roman emperor whose name is associated with the most famous baths in history, received his name from the small town of Dioclea Dalmatia, where he was born about the year 245 A. D.

About the R. F. C. Relief Fund

S. S. Easter of Minneapolis, who was appointed last week to take the place of Sheriff John P. Bordewich as county worker for the poor relief work, was a business caller here on Wednesday. Mr. Easter stated that the funds are limited and that no cash is sent out to anyone who requests help without first making an investigation as to whether or not the applicant is really in need of help from the poor fund.

The county got only $3,750 from the state through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for distribution to the poor and needy, and the money is designed to help children and aged people with food and clothing, Mr. Easter stated.

This is a small fund to cover as large a county as we have and therefore a careful study of each case is made before any help is granted as it will be given only to those who are unable to procure the necessities in any other manner.

If you should need help, call upon some township or village officer and they will notify the committee at Warren and Mr. Easter will call on you.

Ten Years Through Ups and Downs

It is said what goes up must come down.

This is what happened to prices. Now that prices are down there is only one place they can go and that is up. Now is the time to have a little faith in the future and take advantage of the increases as they come along.

Through all of these ups and downs this bank has continued to serve this community. It has been tested beyond all limits and it is here to serve the people in the same old way.

The bank deeply appreciates the confidence of the people that have made it possible to weather all of these storms.

Landed Record Bass

The world's record small mouth bass, weighing 13 pounds 8 ounces, was captured recently by "Red" Kennedy in Lake Gertrude, Lake county, Florida. The word "captured" is used advisedly, since Kennedy's line broke as the fish was being hauled into the boat. Fortunately he was able to grab his prize and get it aboard, although he lost his rod overboard in the process. Kennedy attributes his luck to the fact that, in addition to being red-headed himself, he was fishing with a red-headed plug.

Presidential Campaign Closed in Lively Fashion—Recovery in Industry Seems at Hand—Plan for Disposal of Farm Surplus.

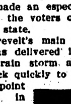
By EDWARD W. PICKARD

FAST and furious were the gyrations of the candidates and their active supporters during the closing week of the campaign, and every known argument was brought to bear on the 47,000,000 qualified voters of the United States, of whom the experts believed nearly 40,000,000 would go to the polls. The electors seemed loth to yield to excitement but were dogged and determined, and probably had made up their minds long before as to how they would cast their ballots. The results of the election will be known to most of the readers of this column before it reaches them, so predictions are not in order.

Herbert Hoover

President Hoover's final effort in his campaign carried him to Springfield, Ill.; St. Louis, Mo.; Gary, Ind., and then up to St. Paul, Minn. On the route he made many platform speeches, but his main addresses were in the cities named. The tour constituted his last attempt to capture the 69 electoral votes of Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota and Wisconsin; and his arguments were also directed to the agricultural vote of Ohio, Nebraska, Kansas, Michigan and the Dakotas. Before leaving Washington for the Middle West the President had spoken vigorously in New York city, Philadelphia, and other points in the East, and had made an especial appeal by radio to the voters of California, his home state.

Governor Roosevelt's main speech of the week was delivered in Boston. A driving rain storm and his desire to get back quickly to Albany led him to disappoint waiting crowds in Hartford, Bridgeport, and other cities of the New England area. The final days of the campaign were spent by the Democratic candidate close to home, but he did not cease to talk to the electorate. Since his nomination he had visited 37 states, the only ones omitted being seven in the solid Democratic South and Nevada, North Dakota, South Dakota and Minnesota.



Franklin D. Roosevelt

SPEAKING to his 300 associates on the New York citizens committee of the emergency unemployment relief committee, Myron C. Taylor, chairman of the United States Steel corporation, declared that the general industrial situation was more promising than it had been for two years. He said it was quite evident "that recovery from the low point of last summer has appeared" and that this recovery "is definite and progressive."

His brief address was made at the committee's first meeting preparatory to the launching of the $15,000,000 drive for funds from the public for unemployment relief.

Encouraging, too, was the news from Jefferson City, Mo., that the citizen's relief and unemployment committee of St. Louis told Governor Caulfield that mild weather and an upturn in industry made it unnecessary to use any of the $209,000 apportioned to St. Louis by the Reconstruction Finance corporation for relief in September. E. C. Steger, a director of the committee, said unexpected increases in orders, particularly in the garment and shoe industries and in railroad shops, with much highway work in progress, made available relief funds adequate.

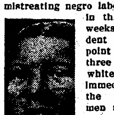
JUST at a time when corn and wheat were selling on the market at the lowest prices on record, there was staged in Kendall county, Illinois, a demonstration of a plan that might wipe out in two years the entire surplus of farm products, according to the county farm bureau and J. J. Groetken of Aurora. It simply is the mixing of ethyl alcohol distilled from corn and other products with gasoline for motor fuel, the proportion of alcohol being 10 per cent. Besides using up the grain surplus, it was pointed out, the move would aid materially in conserving the natural supplies of petroleum in the United States, now being consumed at a rate that is "reducing the national supply at an alarming pace."

The demonstration tended to bear out research reports which have been compiled from several European countries and by the American government on the value of ethyl alcohol as a motor fuel.

Two and one-half gallons of alcohol are obtained from a bushel of corn, two and one-fourth gallons from a bushel of wheat, while barley, potatoes, beets, cantaloupes, and other surplus products produce high yields. At present the use of such alcohol, even when rendered poisonous and soluble in gasoline, is restricted by the prohibition laws as well as by the complications of state and federal gas taxes.

Manufacture of the fuel could be done in rural communities with simple distilling plants, as it is done in Germany, the sponsors of the test declared. By adding one gallon of it at 25 to 30 cents for each nine gallons of gasoline, corn would be worth 40 to 50 cents a bushel and other crops in proportion.

CHARGES that private contractors on federal flood control projects along the lower Mississippi river were mistreating negro laborers, mentioned in this column some weeks ago, led President Hoover to appoint a committee of three negroes and one white man to make immediate inquiry into the situation. The men named were Dr. Robert R. Moton, president of Tuskegee Institute; Judge James A. Cobb of Washington, D. C., and Eugene Knickle Jones, executive secretary of the Urban League of New York, representing the negro race, and Lieut. Col. U. S. Grant, representing the United States army.



Dr. R. R. Moton

A White House announcement of the appointment said the Chief Executive had asked this committee "to make a thorough and impartial inquiry as promptly as possible" and report the results of the investigation to him immediately.

LONG and efficient service for the State department was recognized and rewarded when the President selected F. Lamont Belin of Waverly, Pa., to be ambassador to Poland. He succeeds John N. Willys of Toledo, who resigned not long ago to resume his business duties. Mr. Belin is a veteran in the United States diplomatic corps, having served in the embassies at Peiping, Istanbul, Paris, and London, and as chief of the State department division of protocols and international treaties. He resigned the latter post in March, 1931.

ANNOUNCEMENT was made in New York of the engagement of Miss Elisabeth Reeve Morrow, daughter of Mrs. Dwight W. Morrow and sister-in-law of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, to Aubrey Niel Morgan, son of Mr. and Mrs. John L. Morgan of Brynderwen, Wales. The date for the wedding has not been set. Miss Morrow and Mr. Morgan met while her father, the late Senator Dwight W. Morrow, was attending the London naval conference in 1930. She and her mother had accompanied Senator Morrow to London. Since that time Miss Morrow has visited in England, having passed three months in the summer of 1931 in Europe.

STRICT censorship keeps from the world most of the news concerning the warfare between Bolivia and Paraguay over the Gran Chaco, but it is known that the fighting continues with increasing fury. The minister of war at La Paz has announced that Gen. Hans Kundt, German military expert who organized and trained Bolivia's modern army, has consented to lead that army against the Paraguayans. The latter appear to have competent commanders, also, and have shown no signs of yielding to their opponents. The Argentine war ministry at Buenos Aires stated that many deserters from the Bolivian forces operating in the Gran Chaco were entering Argentine territory.

GENERAL election day in Cuba was marked by many instances of violence, the worst of which was the explosion of a powerful dynamite bomb in a theater in Santa Clara. Five of the 600 persons in the building were killed and many injured. Investigators said the crime was committed by Conservatives in retaliation for what they claimed were government controlled elections.

President Machado's Liberal party candidates were returned overwhelming victors in the voting, in which two senators, 72 representatives, and officials of most Cuban cities were chosen. It was estimated that 80 per cent of the eligible voters did not vote, either through lack of interest or because they heeded the pleas of the opposition to boycott the election.

DEATH claimed two especially well known Americans. They were Horace Kent Tenney, Chicago attorney who was prominent in his profession, and Harold MacGrath, whose novels and short stories had pleased millions of readers

New England.—Anton Schmit, president, and Math Botheim, vice-president, were re-elected by the Farmers' Union Oil company of New England at the annual meeting. The yearly report showed a net profit of $6,697.78.

Valley City.—A committee is completing arrangements for a Boy Scout pet and hobby show to be held here early in December. Plans for the annual meeting of the district committee were advanced by the setting of November 22 as the date.

Mohall.—The Renville county jail was condemned by J. H. Strief, United States federal jail inspector, who gave as reasons poor ventilation, the lack of light and water, and the general unfitness for human habitation.

Dickinson.—The October blizzard which caused so much concern for North Dakota's citizenry had a silver lining for unemployed here. For three days 25 men worked clearing streets.

Bismarck.—A permit has been granted the Interstate Bus Line by the state railroad commission authorizing a passenger, express and freight motor service between Dickinson and Jamestown.

Grand Forks.—The football team of the University of North Dakota will be the guests of the U. N. D. Alumni club at Chicago, following their game with DePaul university at Loyola field November 19, according to Frank Webb, alumni secretary.

Wahpeton.—Climaxing the annual convention of the Tri-State Florists association here, delegates named J. E. Stapleton of Duluth as president to succeed E. J. Rhodes of Jamestown. The next meeting will be in Sioux Falls, early next November.

Minot.—Like a thief in the night will death take six of the fifteen lions in the Roosevelt Park zoo in Minot. Determined to avoid the savor of a public execution, and fully decided to "reduce" the number of lions in the zoo, the park officials are proceeding with the utmost secrecy.

Mott.—Several farmers in this vicinity suffered heavy losses from the October blizzards. One stockman reported having lost 45 pigs weighing on an average of 100 pounds each when he was unable to drive them to shelter in face of the heavy wind.

Arthur.—L. W. Heiden has received a steel fishing rod as reward for landing a 16½-pound Great Northern pike measuring 45 inches, in Lake Melissa, near Shoreham, Minn., last July 3. The rod was given by a Detroit Lakes business house, representing second prize.

Fort Yates.—Closing of the First State bank at Fort Yates and the Solen State bank has left Sioux county without a bank, tying up nearly $12,000 of county funds and several school sinking funds. The Fort Yates bank closed first and the Solen State bank the next day.

Harvey.—The Harvey American Legion post is considering staging a "No Smoke" week here as a means of raising funds for the unemployed. Each man would pay $1 to be a member of the club and he would refrain from smoking for one week. If he desires to smoke, he may do so by paying a $3 fee for the week.

Hatton.—One of those stories of the mountain coming to Mahomet has been successfully completed with the addition of an 80-foot grain elevator to the Gjerke grain plant here. The big structure was moved, intact, 44 miles from Schurmeier, a station north of Grand Forks. A Barnesville, Minn., crew specializing in moving elevators, completed the job in 15 days.

Fargo.—Reductions in the electric rates of Fargo, Grand Forks and Minot, have been approved by the North Dakota railroad commission, it was reported by C. W. McDonnell of that board. Reductions are expected to bring an annual saving to consumers in the three North Dakota cities amounting to $65,000, Mr. McDonnell estimates. Reductions were effective November 1.

They were accompanied on the trip by Coaches Finnegan and Lowe and Everett Wallum, alumni secretary.

Killdeer.—A train of thirty-one cars of livestock consigned to the St. Paul and Chicago markets completed major shipments for the year. Previously a train of 36 cars were shipped from here.

Ellendale.—Construction of a Masonic temple will begin here immediately as a result of joint action by members of Scottish Rite bodies, the Blue lodge and the Order of Eastern Star. The building will be constructed on lots owned by the organization with digging of the basement scheduled to get under way soon.

INDIAN NOT GIVEN HIS DESERVED DUE

World Indebted to Red Man for Many Things.

It is the digging down in ancient rubbish heaps, unearthing unintentional records, that marks the student of archeology, and not the collecting of arrowheads and stone axes and cracked pottery, says Dr. Carl E. Guthe, associate director of the museum of anthropology at the University of Michigan.

Doctor Guthe is a great booster for the first "reds" in American history. He says they have made as great contributions to our civilization as have any of the ancient peoples who are receiving most of the credit. He explains that "more than one-half of our farm products are what the Indians gave us—not in a wild form but already domesticated. The greatest of these farm gifts are corn, potatoes and long staple cotton."

He said they also gave us tomatoes, beans, squashes, artichokes, tobacco, cocoa, quinine and cocaine. This is only a part of the list of farm and forest gifts the Indians made to modern civilization, Doctor Guthe says, but the products named show that the red men made most important contributions to our modern life.

"The Indian has not been given the credit that is his due for his great contributions to civilization. But he has given our modern life as much as have any of the other ancient peoples, such as Egyptians, Hebrews, Greeks, Romans and others. All have contributed their part to make up the complex life which we call civilization. Heretofore, the Indian's contribution has simply been taken as a matter of course, and no credit given. We want to change the books in this respect.

"And the red man was wise in another way, where again he has not been credited by the men who write the textbooks and histories. When the early settlers came rolling over the Alleghenies to populate the rich Mississippi valley, they are said to have found a vast wilderness. This is not altogether true. What they found were vast forests, but all through them were trails and paths made and used by the Indians. These natives knew where they wanted to go, and they found the best trails for this travel. They knew the salt licks, the best places for village sites, the finest hunting grounds.

"The early white settlers used these trails, and later many of them were transformed into main highways. Some of our greatest national roads follow the Indian highway builders. For example, a large part of the Santa Fe trail and the main highway between Detroit and Chicago is the old paths used by the Sauk warriors long before Miles Standish and John Smith were born."

Doctor Guthe holds that the Indians came to North America from somewhere is Asia. They were a crude lot when they arrived; but worked out their own civilization until it reached a very high point.

"The Indians, according to the best evidence we can locate, came from Asia over Bering straits," the Michigan professor said, starting their trek from 10,000 to 20,000 years ago. They came in little groups, all simple people without much civilization. They were entirely independent of the old cultures of both Europe and Asia, working out their high state of living for themselves in their new homes.

"This native civilization reached its highest form in Central America in what are now Guatemala and Yucatan. From there it spread north and south, reaching its lowest stages on the northern and southern fringes of inhabited sections of those cold wildernesses. This first American civilization was all dependent on agriculture, which began over here about 4000 B. C. This sort of life compelled the people to live for a time in one place, thus starting village life."

Rich Pastures Planned for Holland Dairymen

The Zuider zee cut off now from the North sea is known as the Yssel lake, for that river empties itself into this great basin. The lake will presently turn fresh and hereafter will constitute an inexhaustible reservoir of fresh water to be tapped during summer droughts when all the miles upon miles of grassland round about have to be irrigated. Heretofore the necessity of using the semi-salt water of the Zuider zee has made every protracted dry spell a minor disaster to all this cow-milking country. It will take 30 years more to complete the great transition from salt water to dyke land. In behind the great sea-dykes two-thirds of the present area of the Yssel lake is to be dyked off and drained to make room for a million more cow-milkers, which means an annual increase in the output of cheese which staggers the imagination.

The Black Box of Silence

By Francis Lynde

Illustrations by O. Irwin Myers

(WNU Service)

(Copyright by William Gerard Chapman.)

SYNOPSIS

Owen Landis, young inventor, in the little town of Carthage, has developed an extraordinary "silencer," which is stolen from a safe in his laboratory. Landis tells Wally Markham, his chum, the only person, beside himself, knowing the combination of the safe, is Betty Lawson, daughter of a college professor, with whom the inventor is in love. Markham takes a plaster cast of a woman's footprint, found beneath the window of the laboratory, and takes an opportunity to fit it to one of Betty's shoes. They are identical. Betty tells Markham Herbert Canby, a stranger, posing as a "promoter," had driven her home the previous night, and that she had dozed in the car. Markham does not tell Landis of his discovery. Vaguely suspicious of Canby's honesty, he searches his hotel room, in his absence, finding two loaded automatic revolvers and a complete set of burglar's tools. Canby brings the revolvers and burglar's kit to the hotel clerk, claiming to have just found them in his room. That night the safe in the bank of the small town of Perthdale is blown open and looted, the noise of the explosion being unheard. Satisfied that his "black box" is in the hands of crooks, Landis, with Markham, goes to Perthdale. Three strangers, claiming to be business men of Louisville, are the only possible suspects.

"No; not wasting their time or mine. Those Perthdale people didn't have a thing on these chaps; nothing more than that they happened to be driving a car that looked like one somebody had seen going through their town. With fifteen or twenty million cars chasing round over the country—"

"Sure," said Markham; then, "Did these men say which route they were taking to the West?"

"No; I didn't ask 'em. But if they're making for Colorado they probably took the National to St. Louis and Kansas City."

Entirely at a loss as to what to do, other than to wait for the news of another mysterious robbery, Markham and Landis spent the greater part of the forenoon making guarded inquiries at the various garages and filling stations in the hope of hearing something which might indicate the direction taken by the black touring car in leaving Terre Haute, but black touring cars passing through, in all directions, were as plentiful as falling leaves in autumn.

"Well," Markham announced, "I've got one more shot in the locker. I've just remembered that I know the telegraph editor of the Chicago News and I'll wire him to let me know if anything breaks. He'll do it, I'm sure."

Markham wrote his message and dispatched it, and within the next half-hour an answer came. Early in the morning, too late for the news of it to get into the morning papers, a bank had been blown up in the small town of Smithbury, Ill., and nobody had heard the noise of the explosion.

A hasty examination of the route map located the small town three-fourths of the way across Illinois, and a start was made at once. By hard driving the scene of the new devastation was reached a little before dark, and inquiry proved that the Perthdale raid had been repeated, this time, however, with a murder added. The body of the town watchman had been found in the debris of the wrecked bank with a bullet through his heart.

Again, as in Perthdale, the accepted theory seemed to be that a hitherto unknown and noiseless explosive had been employed. At this, Landis, with a growing sense of his culpability as the inventor of the box of silence, insisted that it was no more than right that he should tell the story of his invention and its loss, regardless of the consequences to himself. But to this Markham objected strenuously.

"It wouldn't help matters in the least, and it would most likely mean all sorts of trouble for you," was his emphatic protest. "You are no more responsible than is the inventor of the nitroglycerin or dynamite these yeggs are using."

"But am I not withholding information that the authorities ought to have?"

"They would doubtless say you were—and give you the third degree to try to get more out of you. No; thus far, we have the only clew that promises anything at all, and these city sleuths would only make a hash of it if we should pass it along to them. We'll get a bite to eat and go on."

"Where to, from here?" Landis queried.

"I'll show you, after we get a lunch put up. We can eat as we go."

It was still early in the evening, and, driving out of town to the southward, Markham made a half circle, cutting all the roads leading to the westward. At each intersection he made inquiries at the nearest farm house, and by this means they were once more upon the trail of a black touring car answering the description given them by the Perthdale banker. An early rising farmer had seen such a car; it had stopped opposite his gate to change a tire. Markham questioned the farmer closely.

"How many people were in the car?"

"Couldn't tell. There was two men changing the tire, and another inside. That was all I saw."

"Could you see them well enough to describe them?"

"Not all of 'em—just one. Tall feller, smooth-faced, pretty well dressed. Had somethin' the matter with one ear—looked like what you read about them prize fighters' ears; I forgit what you call it."

"Cauliflower ear," Markham supplied. "What kind of clothes was he wearing?"

Here the farmer was at fault; couldn't remember about the clothes except that they were neat and citified.

Markham let the clutch engage and the blue roadster sped on to the westward.

Throughout the evening they had little difficulty in tracing the black touring car. A garage keeper had talked with one of the men, and he had said he and his companions were from Louisville and were on their way to Colorado on a business trip. Asked if he had heard of the Smithbury robbery and murder, the garage man said he had; that the tire buyer had told him about it.

"Some nerve, and it chimes in pretty well with your notion of a bold, bad bluff," was Markham's comment, as they drove on into the night. But now Landis was beginning to admit a doubt.

"We are taking an enormous lot for granted, Wally, don't you think? The men are not acting like robbers."

"You may be right, at that," Markham conceded. "It is all a raw chance, I'll admit. But now we are on the way, we'll keep going until we catch up with them and give them the once-over."

At Hannibal they learned the number of the black car with the Kentucky license plates.

Their stop for the night was made at a late hour at Chillicothe, and as Markham drove into the garage near the hotel he was assigned a space beside a dark-colored touring car, dusty and wayworn. As he was giving the garage keeper directions about putting the blue roadster in condition for an early start in the morning he chanced to glance at the number plate of the dusty car.

"That car standing beside mine; who owns it?" he demanded.

"I don't know," said the garage owner; "bought it today from two fellows who drove through from Louisville. I got a bargain off 'em."

"Two, you say? Weren't there three?"

"No, only two. It's all straight. They had a bill of sale, giving the motor number and all. To make sure, I wired the Louisville dealer who'd sold 'em the car, and got his answer. They gave me the dealer's name and address."

"You say they took the train. Do you know where they were headed for?"

"Somewhere out in Colorado, they said. They took the four o'clock—or I s'pose they did."

"Can you describe them?"

"Why—I don't know as I could; nothing unusual about 'em except that the tall one, the one that did most of the talking, had a queer looking bunch on one ear. Excuse me, but what are you two, anyway? Detectives?"

"Not exactly. But we are interested in these men."

"No chance that this is a stolen car, is there?"

"Probably not, since you have traced it to the Louisville dealer who sold it. Did the men have any hand baggage?"

"Suitcases—couple of 'em."

"No other baggage?" Markham pressed.

"Nothing but a camera. One of 'em, the short one was carrying that in a shawl strap."

"What kind of a camera?"

"I didn't notice, particular'; only that it looked too big for a kodak and not big enough for a movie machine."

As they left the garage Markham said, "Well, Owen, maybe it isn't such a wild goose chase after all. What do you think now?"

"There have been three men in that car all along; I'm wondering what became of the third man."

"So am I. Also, I am wondering why they sold their car."

Landis was silent for a moment and then he burst out excitedly, "I've got it, Wally—I'm almost sure I've got it! It was a bluff—it's been one all the way along. These men are the men we want, and they're going to stop off at some small place and wreck another bank! That's why the third man didn't show up. He was left behind to either buy or steal another car!"

"Too late to prove up on that guess tonight," Markham said. "We'll find out bright and early tomorrow morning if your guess is right."

They were up betimes to go in search of the proof or disproof of Landis' guess. At the place to which they had been directed they found the auto dealer just opening his door. Markham introduced himself and asked his question.

"Do you mind telling us if you sold a car yesterday?"

"I sold two of them; one on the installment plan, and one for good, hard cash on the nail."

"It is the cash sale that we are interested in," said Markham, with his most engaging smile. "Did you know your purchaser?"

"Never laid eyes on him before. He just blew in and said he wanted to buy a car. I showed him a new eight we'd just got in, and he counted out the money, climbed in and drove off, just like that," with a snap of his fingers.

"Could you describe the man?"

"Yes, in a general way; medium sized and height, somewhere along in his thirties, I'd say, light complected, sandy hair, smooth face, fairly well dressed. Nothing wrong, is there?"

"Er—we don't know—yet," Markham said. "You say he drove away at once? How about the license plates?"

"I lent him a pair of my own—dealer's plates, you know. He said he'd be in his home state in a day or so and didn't want to buy a Missouri license for such a short time. Said he'd send my plates back to me when he got home."

"Well, where are we now?" Landis asked, as they returned to the hotel.

"Up in the air again," Markham replied shortly. "If your guess is right, there was probably another bank smash last night, somewhere; but if there was, it may have been either east, west, north or south. We're stuck again until we can get hold of a news wire."

Landis' inspirational prediction of the night before had a startling confirmation. The night operator at one of the railway stations had just come in, and he brought the news. A bank in a small town some fifty miles west had been blown up early in the night; and again, so the wire report said, the explosion had not awakened people.

"Well, I guess that knocks the last, lingering doubt for the count," was Markham's comment upon the railroad telegrapher's story of the latest foray. "The two who took the train dropped off at the agreed-upon place, and the other drove the new Fleetwing. Finish your coffee and we'll check up on the guess."

A ninety-minute run brought them to the scene of the latest raid, the market town of a farming community. At the railroad station they questioned the agent. The man's answers confirmed Markham's guess. Two men, carrying suit cases and something that the agent thought was a camera, had arrived on the local train of the previous afternoon, and, instead of going uptown, took a waiting auto and drove away.

"This was late in the afternoon, wasn't it?" Markham asked.

"Along about dusk. Forty-three was held up by a freight wreck and she was away late."

They took their leave. When they were again whipping the miles to the rear, Markham said, "Simple enough, isn't it?"

"Perfectly. They drove away and waited until the town was asleep. Their job done, they went on west—for a guess. That's the way they've been heading all along. We've been missing one bet as we came along, Wally; the names of these three men. We could have got them from the Terre Haute sheriff, or from the auto dealer in Chillicothe."

"Nothing to that. If they're the crooks we think they are, they'd use aliases, of course; and different ones in different places."

"No, you're wrong there. So far as we've been able to learn, they have been posing consistently as three business men from Louisville right from the beginning. And you'll remember that two of them gave the Chillicothe garage man a Louisville address to which he could wire."

"That's so; I'd forgotten that. It's either a clean slate, or the nerviest bluff that was ever put up, Owen—and I'm still believing it's a bluff."

Inquiring as they went, they heard no word of a Fleetwing Eight until they reached St. Joseph. But here the submerged trail came to the surface again. A garage man's memoranda showed that a new Fleetwing Eight had stopped for gas. Driving on into the city, and to a hotel, they found that three west-bound tourists, hailing from Louisville, had come in shortly after midnight and had gone immediately to bed. They had checked out after breakfast and had resumed their journey.

Looking up the names signed in the register, Markham made a note of them; and a little later a wire of inquiry went to the cashier of a Louisville bank. The answer was in the nature of a sudden bucketing of cold water.

"Here's where we get it in the nose," said Markham with a sheepish grin, as he handed the telegram to Landis.

Landis read the few typewritten lines:

"To Walter Markham,

"St. Joseph, Missouri.

"Parties named are prominent business men this city stop They left for Colorado, driving, some days ago stop Understand they are interested in Western mines.

"A. J. Westover."

He was watching Markham's grin when he passed the square of yellow paper back across the table.

"I guess that settles it definitely. You said, in the beginning, it might turn out to be a wild-goose chase, and it has."

"I'll say it has!" Markham grunted. "Just the same, there are still a few things that need explaining. These men started from Louisville for Colorado; why are they taking this roundabout route?"

"There may be a dozen good reasons."

Lost 20 Lbs. of Fat In Just 4 Weeks

Mrs. Mae West of St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I'm only 28 yrs. old and weighed 170 lbs. until taking one box of your Kruschen Salts just 4 weeks ago. I now weigh 150 lbs. I also have more energy and furthermore I've never had a hungry moment."

Fat folks should take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast—it's the SAFE, harmless way to reduce as tens of thousands of men and women know.

For your health's sake ask for and get Kruschen at any drug store—the cost for a bottle that lasts 4 weeks is but a trifle and if after the first bottle you are not joyfully satisfied with results—money back.

S. AMERICA'S LOCATION TESTS MEMORY OF MANY

There is a general belief, especially among adults who have not studied geography for years, that South America is directly south of the United States.

A glance at a map, however, will reveal that only the far northwestern part of that continent lies due south of the extreme eastern section of this country, the main portion of South America protruding farther eastward than the United States into the Atlantic ocean.

In fact, a straight line drawn on a map from Cleveland, Ohio, through Jacksonville, Florida, and downward into the Pacific ocean, will just touch the extreme western tip of South America.

Another revelation to many, after glancing at a map, will be that the nearest South American neighbor of this country is the Republic of Colombia, from which the United States obtains practically all of the finest coffees used for domestic consumption. Colombia is the second largest coffee producer in the world.

U. S. BUYS 90% OF COLOMBIA'S COFFEES

Coffee is Colombia's aristocrat, both as a beverage and as a raw product.

In other words, Colombians take as much care and pride in preparing their "cafe" as a drink as they do in cultivating the trees which produce coffees, famed throughout the world for their fine full flavor and aroma.

Picking Coffee Cherries.

In that republic, all coffee cherries are hand-picked, not stripped, from the branches.

During either a social or business visit, Colombians always serve their guests "tintos"—small cups of coffee without cream or sugar. This custom is becoming increasingly popular throughout America in the serving of demi-tasse.

Colombia is the world's largest quantity producer of the best grades of coffees, known as "milds." More than nine-tenths of Colombia's entire output is purchased in the United States for domestic consumption.

COLOMBIA ADOPTS MODERNIZING PLAN

NEW YORK—Keen interest is being evinced by American financiers, importers and world travelers in recent modernization developments throughout the Republic of Colombia, the nearest South American neighbor of the United States.

Most of the Colombian cities are being transformed from ancient colonial settlements into modern metropolitan centers having both the aspect and conveniences of those in the United States. In addition, important railroad lines and motor highways are being extended and river channels opened to facilitate the movement of products from the inland to Barranquilla and Cartagena on the Atlantic, and Buenaventura on the Pacific coast of Colombia.

Cartagena, Colombia, Where Modern Architecture Vies with Old.

These transportation improvements have become imperative because of the rapidly increasing volume of exports from that country. Approximately 400,000,000 pounds of coffee, 11,000,000 stems of bananas, 18,000,000 barrels of petroleum, $9,000,000 worth of gold and $1,750,000 of platinum are exported from Colombia to world markets annually.

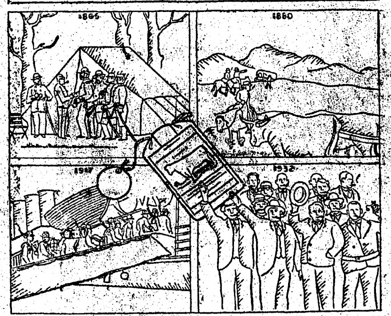
Coffee is Colombia's principal export product, as well as being a very important factor in the life of the country in general. More than 90 per cent of the annual crop of Colombia, which is the second largest coffee-producing country in the world, is exported to the United States.

COFFEE CONSUMPTION IN U. S. DOUBLES SINCE '13

Coffee, which has been used throughout the ages for widely diversified purposes, such as food, wine and medicine before it found its real place as a world beverage, has shown marked increase in popularity during the last twenty years.

This is particularly true in the United States, in which consumption of coffee has almost doubled since 1913. Much of this extraordinary increase is attributed by authorities to the greater use of the world's finest full-flavored coffees, which are produced in Colombia, in American blends and brands.

Product's Fame Is Historical



In the annals of American industry, there is one product whose name is writ large in the pages of the nation's history. It came into its own in a crucial period in American history, the Civil War; it played its part in the winning of the West; it was the best friend of the nation's armed forces in the World War, and at present, in the War against Depression, it is standing millions of Americans in good stead.

This product, which is known the world over by its distinctive trademark, the sturdy "Bull" Durham, was first manufactured in Durham, North Carolina, shortly before the Civil War. As the conflict wore on to a bitter end, the soldiers who passed through that section of North Carolina had plenty of opportunity to test the delights of this product and carry it home with them. The result was such an enormously increased demand for this tobacco that the owner of the plant, John R. Green, adopted the "Bull" as a trade-mark to protect his product against imitators.

The business, under the sign of the "Bull", grew by leaps and bounds. American enterprise carried the little white muslin bag with its yellow string and familiar tag across the plains to the Pacific Coast and thence to far places and to strange peoples.

When the doughboys in 1917 embarked to the strains of "Over There", the "Bull" went with them. Buck privates and ranking officers alike shared the common pleasures of "rolling your own".

And at present, when the industrial forces of the country are armed to fight the new foe—depression — many a thrifty smoker swears by the "Bull's" new slogan, "Roll your own and save your 'roll'."

Chauffeurs Renew Licenses in November

Chauffeurs expecting to renew their licenses will do well to remember that by making application to the secretary of state during the month of November, they may be spared the inconvenience and extra expense of taking an examination. The following provision of state law governs:

"All chauffeurs' licenses issued hereunder shall expire at midnight on December 31 of the year for which it is issued, but may be renewned without examination upon such evidence as shall satisfy the secretary of state that the licensee is qualified to continue as a chauffeur, but no renewal of a license issued before November 1, in any year shall be granted unless application for such renewal is made during the month of November of the year for which the license was issued."

Bids Received For 1933 State Road Work

Bid were opened by State Highway Commissioner Babcock recently at the state highway offices in St. Paul on 8 grading, 2 swamp fill, 5 graveling and 8 bridge jobs. The 8 bridge jobs, 5 of the graveling and 5 of the grading jobs are in the regular program of the state highway department for 1933 work. The others have been placed in the emergency relief classification under the conditions of emergency aid required by the federal government.

Dependent upon weather conditions, work on some of the projects, Commissioner Babcock reports, will possibly get under way before or very soon after the opening of the new year.

Mrs. F. K. Fredrickson returned home last week from Kindred, N. Dak., where she has spent about two months at the home of her sister.

Grand Jury Will Sit At Court This Fall

For the first time in several years, a grand jury will be called into session at the regular fall term of district court for Marshall county which will convene in Warren on Monday, Nov. 28, with the Honorable Julius J. Olson as presiding judge.

Several criminal cases, the nature of which have not been disclosed, will require the services of the Grand Jury, and as a result 23 Marshall county men and women will be impaneled for service, according to A. C. Swandby. It is understood some of the cases involve carnal knowledge.

Court will convene on Monday morning, Nov. 28, at 10 o'clock when the calendar for the term will be set. The first week of the term will be devoted to the trail of court cases before Judge Olson. On Tuesday morning, Nov. 29, at 10 o'clock, the grand jury will begin its sessions.

The order from the Clerk of Court also calls for 30 petit jurors who will convene on Monday morning, December 5, at 10 o'clock. The petit jury will try cases as set by the calendar.

Those from here whom will serve on the grand jury are: Edwin Johnson of Mud Lake and Frank Horien of Holt townships.

Those whom will serve on the petit jury from here are: Mrs. A. C. Conklin, Hjalmer Johnson and Albert Bennes.

Hunters Return With Kill

Most of the local sportsmen here have spent the past week in the woods in this county and in Beltrami county hunting for the elusive deer.

The first crew to bring in their deer were Harland Gunheim, Harry Engen and H. O. Hanson. They spent four days in hunting in the burned-over area near Shilling post office in Beltrami county, and arrived home on Tuesday with two fine specimens. Gunheim and Engen bagged a big buck weighing 176 pounds and Hanson brought down a smaller one.

On Wednesday evening, Sam and Richard Lorentson, A. L. Carlson and Theo. Ness returned home from near Randeen after a three day hunt. They brought home a fine big buck which Sam Lorentson shot on Wednesday.

The Steinhauer and Hoffman brothers, who also spent a few days in Beltrami county, came home the first part of the week and, according to reports from them, ten were in the party and they brought home ten deer.

Battle Is On For Control of House

Farmer-Laborites and stalwarts are lining up their forces for the first test of strength in the Twin Cities. Both sides claim they will control the next house of representatives, but no one will know until the first meeting is held.

It takes 66 votes to control the house and the conservatives claim to have 75 or 80. However the Farmer-Labor forces claim to have the same number, counting on several independents of knows liberal tendencies to favor them. The Farmer-Labor caucus will be held at the Lowry Hotel, November 26, according to a call sent out by John J. McDonough of St. Paul. Should the progressives succeed in naming the house speaker it will be the first time in forty years that the house is in progressive control.

Ten Years Through Ups and Downs

It is said what goes up must come down.

This is what happened to prices. Now that prices are down there is only one place they can go and that is up. Now is the time to have a little faith in the future and take advantage of the increases as they come along.

Through all of these ups and downs this bank has continued to serve this community. It has been tested beyond all limits and it is here to serve the people in the same old way.

The bank deeply appreciates the confidence of the people that have made it possible to weather all of these storms.

Who Put "O.K." in Our Language?

Keokuk

William Henry Harrison

By ELMO SCOTT WATSON

YOU hear it everywhere you go, for Americans have almost forgotten how to say "Yes!" Instead they say "O-kay!" It has become an almost universally accepted symbol of assent. It has also become a similarly accepted symbol of approval. When we say anything is "O-kay" (or "O. K." or "Okeh") we mean that it is good or satisfactory. Not only has this triple-spelling, double-meaning expression already become common currency in our language (or "slanguage," if you prefer!) but it has also already undergone both abbreviation and inversion without, apparently, changing its meaning. If you don't want to take the time to say "O-kay!" or "Okeh!" just cut it down to "Oke!" (accent on the "o") and any American will understand at once what you mean. So much for the abbreviation of an expression so short that a further shortening seems impossible.

As for the inversion: Consider now the hypothetical case of an Englishman coming to an American with this inquiry: "I say, old fellow, what do you Americans mean when you say 'K. O.'?" "Oh, that!" replies the helpful American, is an expression from the prize ring. When a boxer is knocked out, we say the other fellow wins by a K. O." "But," says the Britisher with a puzzled look on his face, "This was a little boy I heard answering a playmate who had asked him to come across the street and play with him. I heard him shout 'K. O.!' very plainly." "Oh, that!" replies the American. "He meant 'All right!' You know we use the term 'O. K.' to mean all right or yes. It's pronounced O-kay. Well, some of the boys just turn it around and use K. O., which is pronounced Kayo and it means the same thing. That's clear enough isn't it?" And the baffled Britisher murmurs "'Strordinary!"

But the Briton is no more baffled by this illogical example of our illogical every-day American speech than is the etymologist who tries to run down the origin of the expression and to determine who put it into our language. Here are a few of the theories:

1. Olga K. Neviskoff was a fascinating Russian woman who is believed to have had an important influence on English history as a friend of the famous premier, William E. Gladstone. It is said that Gladstone used to submit many important matters to her for her opinion and these papers were generally returned to him with her initials, O. K., penned upon them.

2. In Santo Domingo is the town of Aux Cayes (pronounced o-kay) from which, in Colonial times, the best tobacco and rum were imported. Clerks, it is said, in billing goods to retailers made use of the phonetic letters O. K. for the sake of brevity in indicating that these goods came from Aux Cayes and were therefore of the best quality.

3. Keokuk was a famous chief of the Sac and Foxe Indians in Iowa. He was affectionately referred to by the whites as "Ole Keokuk" because he was a "good Indian." Being unable to spell his name, he made his signature by using his initials "O. K." and any paper which had his "O. K." was "all right."

4. Back in Civil war days Orrin Kendall was a member of a battery raised among the Board of Trade in Chicago. He was also head of the baking firm of O. Kendall and Sons, which furnished bread and crackers for the army. On the crackers were the initials of "O. K." for Orrin Kendall. These crackers are said to have been the only ones the soldiers relished and their expression "These crackers are O. K." soon developed into meaning "These crackers are all right."

5. In 1840 during the famous "hard cider and log cabin" Presidential campaign of Gen. William Henry Harrison, there was a Whig rally at Urbana, Ohio, which was addressed by a number of prominent Whigs, including General Harrison himself. The farmers were largely represented at the gatherings and one of them had brought his farm wagon on which was constructed a platform for the accommodation of his neighbors. The farmer was an ardent Whig and, wishing to convey the impression that the farmers generally were Whigs, he hung a banner above the platform. On the banner were these words "The farmers is Ol' Korrect." There was also a hotel at Springfield, Ohio, operated by an ardent Whig who placed the letters "O. K." over the entrance, explaining that it meant his hotel was all right, or "Oll Korrect"—taking those words from the banner on the farmer's wagon. In this same campaign Harrison's opponents made much of his alleged illiteracy and they circulated the story that Harrison, while a commander in the army, endorsed his papers "O. K." under the impression that it was the abbreviation for "Oll Korrect," his way of spelling "All Correct."

6. The origin of "O. K." meaning "all right" is traced to Andrew Jackson in three different ways. One of them is this: In the court of records of Sumner county, Tennessee, for October 6, 1790, appears the fact that on that date "Andrew Jackson, Esq. proved a bill of sale from Hugh McGary to Gasper Mansker for a negro man, which was O. K." It is said that what appeared to be O. K. in the record may really have been a poorly penned O. R., which was the abbreviation used for "Ordered Recorded." That such a mistake, due to bad penmanship, might easily have been made is further proved by the fact that Hugh (not High) McGary and Caspar (not Gasper) Mansker were two well-known frontier characters of the time and both names are misspelled in the entry.

During the campaign of 1832 Jackson's alleged illiteracy (as in the case of Harrison later) was one of the chief butts of his opponents. Seba Smith in a series of letters written to a Maine paper under the name of Major Jack Downing is said to have originated the story that Jackson endorsed his paper "O. K." under the impression that it was the abbreviation for "Oll Korrect."

(As previously stated, this same canard was apparently revived and used against Harrison in 1840.)

The third way in which the origin of the expression is traced to Jackson involves his friendship with the famous Choctaw Indian chief, Pushmataha. Jackson and Pushmataha had fought together against the Creeks in 1812-13 and Jackson frequently heard the Indian chief use an expression, "si HoKa," to end all statements or to wind up a conversation. It was a colloquialism meaning "that's me" or "that's what I said," and as Pushmataha pronounced it, it sounded like "O'kay" or "Okeh." In rendering it into English and in using it as a symbol of approval, Jackson is said to have translated it into the literal "O. K."

Similar evidence to support the Indian origin of the term is contained in Bylington's "Grammar of the Choctaw Language" which gives "o-keh" as meaning "it is so and in no other way."

If, as it seems most highly probable, the expression did originate in the Choctaw language and Pushmataha was principally responsible for its gift to the white man, he is worthy of more than passing comment. In fact, he is worthy of being remembered much longer for other things than for the mere accident of his using an expression which became a common Americanism. For Andrew Jackson frequently expressed the opinion that he was the greatest and bravest Indian he had ever known and John Randolph of Roanoke, in pronouncing a eulogy on him in the United States senate, uttered the words regarding his wisdom, his eloquence and his friendship for the whites that were afterward inscribed on his monument.

Pushmataha's Indian name was Apushim-alhtaha, which means "the sapling is ready, or finished, for him." According to the biography of him in the "Handbook of American Indians," issued by the Bureau of American Ethnology, he was born in Noxubee county in Mississippi in 1764. Before he was twenty years of age he distinguished himself in an expedition against the Osages.

Young Pushmataha disappeared early in the conflict that lasted all day and on rejoining the Choctaw warriors he was jeered at and accused of being a coward, whereupon he replied, "Let those laugh who can show more scalps than I can." Saying this, he threw down the scalps of five of the enemy whom he had slain by himself.

Later he became head of the Oklahannali or Six Towns district of the Choctaws and exerted his powerful influence in promoting friendly relations with the whites. In 1811 when Tecumseh, the great Shawnee leader, visited the Choctaw to persuade them to join in his conspiracy against the Americans, Pushmataha opposed him so strongly that the Choctaws remained loyal to the United States. During the War of 1812 it was Pushmataha's influence which held them loyal to the Americans when the Creeks tried to persuade them to cast their fortunes with the British.

In a council held to decide what course the Choctaws would pursue, Pushmataha made an eloquent speech in which he said "The Creeks were once our friends. They have joined the English and we must now follow different trails. When our fathers took the hand of Washington, they told him the Choctaw would always be friends of his nation and Pushmataha cannot be false to their promises. I am now ready to fight against both the English and the Creeks."

And fight he did! At the head of 500 warriors he served under Jackson in the Pensacola campaign, taking part in 24 battles and skirmishes. In 1813 with about 150 warriors he joined General Claiborne and distinguished himself in the attack and defeat of the Creeks under the famous Weatherford at the Battle of Holy Ground in Alabama. While aiding the American troops he is said to have instituted such a rigid system of discipline among his warriors that they made a fine record as soldiers and won for Pushmataha the title of "the Indian General."

FEW GREAT NOVELS FREE FROM ERRORS

Descriptions by No Means Infallible Guides.

The reports that recent archeological discoveries in Palestine confirm in many respects the Biblical descriptions of ancient cities gave to a commentator an opportunity to take a dig at writers of later days, whose descriptions, he said, would not be such infallible guides for succeeding generations. He called attention to the error of Shakespeare in putting Bohemia on a seacoast, of Byron in saying that he stood on the Bridge of Sighs, "a palace and a prison on each hand," and of Hugh Walpole in placing a character of one of his historical novels in a town not founded until 200 years after the date of that character's birth. Last summer the Lorna Doone country had as visitors many readers of Blackmore's romance, and as the author had described with considerable detail the scenes of the story his admirers considered his book a guide. A critical visitor, however, declared that the descriptions were often faulty and that, as an instance, it would have been impossible for Lorna and John Ridd to carry out their plan of arranged signals. Dr. James Muirhead, editor of several travelers' handbooks, wrote to Blackmore years ago of the discrepancies between the actual features of the Doone valley and the description in "Lorna Doone," and, says Doctor Muirhead in the London Times, the novelist replied that "if he had had any idea his novel would become so popular he would have taken pains to be more faithful to the scenic facts instead of embroiding them."

On account of the haste with which he produced most of his novels Sir Walter Scott was forgiven for many of the mistakes which he permitted to creep into his works. In one story he has the sun setting in the east; in another he gives two horsemen six days to make a journey at their fastest speed, and then a few pages further on he has the same distance covered in a day, and in "Ivanhoe" he set, according to critics, a task for the mount in a tournament which no horse could possibly perform. In his introduction to "The Talisman," written in July, 1832, two months before his death, he forestalled criticism by saying that he wrote of a country of which he was unacquainted. "I labored," he said, "under the incapacity of ignorance in which, as far as regards eastern manners, I was as thickly wrapped as an Egyptian in his fog." The guides on the field of Waterloo placed little credence in either Byron's of Thackeray's description of the ball the night preceding the battle, but they will show the spot where Wellington shouted, "Up, guards, and at them!" and also quote the duke's words, "Waterloo was won on the playing fields at Eton." When told that Wellington disclaimed either as his words they reply, "That's what the novelists say." No one seems ever to have pinned them down to who were the novelists.

Another among the great novelists who confessed to mistakes was Thackeray, who declared he never reread a page of his composition but that he found "a fault or two, a half dozen." His geography of Virginia must have been somewhat faulty when he gave to the Esmonds the vast tract that extended from the Potomac to the James, with ports on both streams; he must have forgotten his law when he has one of his characters living in America arrested in church for debt, an unlawful proceeding, and he casts some doubt on the dean of Winchester's good deed in writing a letter in the ninth chapter of "Henry Esmond" after he had him die in the sixth. Dean Swift wrote that Pennsylvania "wanted the shelter of mountains," since it was open to the northern winds from Hudson bay's frozen seas, and a writer of the last century wrote of "an overseer on a Massachusetts cotton plantation." Geography was a puzzle to many other novelists; Charles Lever put Andalusia in Portugal, and the usually correct Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch placed Bombay on the bay of Bengal, eastern coast of India, instead of on the Arabian sea and western coast. Even Thiers, the French historian, slipped when he wrote of a great European battle: "Throughout the day torrents of rain poured down and twenty thousand Austrians bit the dust."—New York Sun.

Happy Returns

Bebe Daniels told a story at the reception at the Hotel Ambassador in Los Angeles that followed the wedding of Bessie Love and William B. Holiday.

"A girl," she said, "was bragging about her fiance.

"'People think George is mean,' she bragged, 'but he gave me a box of half a dozen lipsticks for Christmas.'

"'Pooh,' said another girl, 'he knows he'll get them back.'"

Jed Hopkins, The Philosopher Who Never Went to College

WELL, folks, I jist diskivered somethin' thet brings back t' mind th' old sayin' about all is not gold what glitters. Somethin' men is more likely t' get fooled on quicker'n women. But women'll probably be wantin t' know about this too.

Y'see, me an' Henry Miller—Henry's a right smart 'n upstandin' merchant here in our town—well, me'n Henry wuz atalkin' th' other day about things in gener'l when in comes Aunt Letty Moore.

Now before I git any further along, I jist wanta put in a word about Aunt Letty Moore. 'Cause Aunt Letty's about th' smartest woman aroun' these parts even though she's goin' on 73 years come Christmas. An' guess Aunt Letty's fergot more'n most th' women folk hereabouts ever knowed when it comes to cookin'. Leastways, when somebody's cake kinda fergot to come up in th' middle or somethin' else happens, it's genrly Aunt Letty who gits called inta consultation.

But to git back to my story. In comes Aunt Letty an' she sez, "Henry Miller," she sez it kinda tart too, "Henry Miller, what kinda flour did yu sell young Gabe Post's wife las' Sattidy?" An' then, before Henry cud git started, she sez, "An' whyn't yu give her Gold Medal like I tole yu to. Now she's gone an' ruint another cake. An' after me jus' gittin' through tellin' her what's what about cake makin'. An' . . ."

"Say," Henry gits his oar in. "Hold on there, Aunt Letty. Lemme tell yu the straight of this. Young Gabe cum in an' goes over an' picks up a sack of thet Merry Sunshine Flour an' takes it on home. How was I t' know but he hez his orders t' git thet kind? Course, hed he asked, I coulda told him 'tweren't a fancy flour. Mostly a fancy sack. But I guess Gabe jist looked an' see it cost about 40c less'n Gold Medal an' . . ."

"Yes!" sez Aunt Letty, "An' Gabe's wife jist lost more'n 40c worth of cake on accounta Gabe's bein' took in by a fancy sack an' a few pennies savin's. But when I git through with him, he'll . . ."

An' don't yu folks think fer a minit thet Aunt Letty didn' tell Gabe 'bout how t' buy flour. Gabe tole me she lit right inta him. Made him go back down an' buy a sack of Gold Medal, too. But, an' he kinda brightened up, he figgered the elegant cakes an' bread an' pies an' things he's gittin' these days makes up fer it all.

Which only goes t' show yu can't go by the outside. Yu got to know what's on the inside of everything yu buy. That's why it pays to ask yore merchant about what yer buyin'—an' do what he tells yu.

STORY FOR YOUNG FOLKS

By THORNTON W. BURGESS

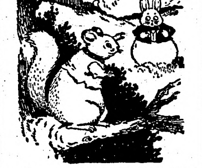
PETER RABBIT'S FEELINGS ARE HURT

Loafer, loafer at your ease
Learn a lesson from the bees!

THIS is what little Striped Chipmunk had shouted at Peter Rabbit when Peter tried to get him to come and play with him. Peter just grinned as he watched Striped Chipmunk scamper about on the edge of the Green Forest and presently start for home with the pockets of his cheeks stuffed with beachnuts. It seemed to Peter that it was no time at all before Striped Chipmunk was back after more nuts. It was very clear that he had no time for play; he was too busy.

Peter watched him a while, and then growing tired of seeing Striped Chipmunk work so hard he went on. Presently he spied Chatterer the Red Squirrel in a chestnut tree. "Come play with me!" cried Peter "It's a splendid day for a frolic."

"You mean it's a splendid day to work," shouted Chatterer. "I can't afford to be a loafer like you." With this Chatterer stuffed his mouth full of nuts and whisked out of sight to hide them in his secret storehouse.



"Let's Play Hide-and-Seek!" Cried Peter.

Once more Peter grinned and went his way until he met Happy Jack the Gray Squirrel. "Let's play hide-and-seek!" cried Peter.

"Some other day," replied Happy Jack, hunting among the fallen leaves for nuts. "I can't afford to be a loafer like you such fine weather as this."

This time Peter didn't grin. It was the third time he had been called a loafer. At first he hadn't minded, but now he was beginning to feel a wee bit hurt. You know a loafer is one who sits around and does nothing. He never works. Peter could see no reason why he should work. He would much rather play or take his ease. He couldn't understand why others should work as they were doing, but that was their affair, not his. If they got pleasure from work all well and good but they needn't call him a loafer. He would leave them to their labor and go down to the Smiling Pool.

So he left the Green Forest and started across the Green Meadows lipperty-lipperty-lip as fast as he could go to the Smiling Pool. By the time he got there he had quite forgotten that he had been a little hurt in his feelings. The instant he poked his head over the bank he saw Jerry Muskrat. Jerry was hard at work on the roof of his house. He saw Peter as soon as Peter saw him.

"Hello, loafer!" shouted Jerry. "Did you ever know finer weather for work? Why don't you get busy and do something?"

"I've nothing to do," mumbled Peter, and without another word he turned and started for home. He would have liked to stay and watch Jerry, but Jerry had called him "loafer," just as had Striped Chipmunk and Chatterer and Happy Jack, and somehow he began to feel that these busy workers looked down on him and the feeling wasn't a comfortable one. As he happened along toward the dear Old Brier Patch where he could sit and doze and dream to his heart's content with no one to call him unpleasant names, he met Danny Meadow Mouse hurrying as if he had no time to lose.

"What's your rush?" demanded Peter.

"I'm making the most of this fine weather to fill my storehouse with seeds for the winter," replied Danny Meadow Mouse. "I can't afford to be a loafer like you, Peter."

This was too much. Even little Danny Meadow Mouse called him a loafer. Perhaps none of them really meant anything, but just the same Peter's feelings were hurt. All the brightness of the beautiful fall day was gone for Peter. When Striped Chipmunk called him a loafer he hadn't minded, but when one after another his other friends had called him the same thing it had hurt. The more he thought of it the more it hurt. Could it be that they looked down on him because he never worked? It certainly looked that way. He reached the dear Old Brier Patch and crept in to his favorite resting place without letting Mrs. Peter know that he had returned. He wanted to be alone to think.

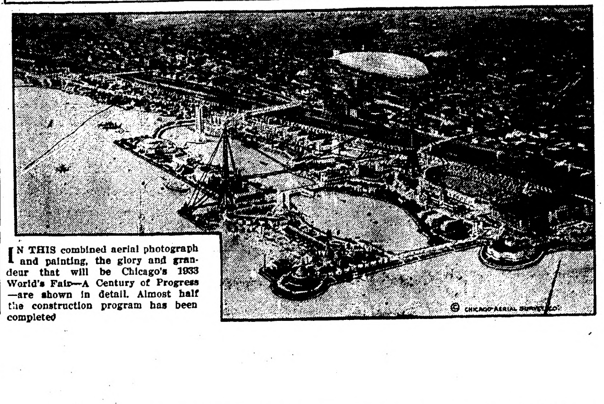
What a Century of Progress Will Look Like



IN THIS combined aerial photograph and painting, the glory and grandeur that will be Chicago's 1933 World's Fair—A Century of Progress—are shown in detail. Almost half the construction program has been completed

BUTTER SPREADS

WITH butter as a base, one may prepare various spreads that will add much to a sandwich; or made into butter balls and served with bread at the table, will add to any menu. With a crisp lettuce leaf or a slice or two of pickle or cucumber one has a tasty sandwich always on tap. The butters are kept in jars in the ice chest and will keep for some time.

Crab or Lobster Butter.

Pound to a paste one small can of lobster or crab, or its equivalent of cooked fresh fish. Season lightly with pepper. When using this butter for sandwich filling spread one slice of bread with mayonnaise and the other with the crab mixture, add a lettuce leaf or slice of cucumber and serve.

Sardine Butter.

Take one-fourth cupful of butter, four large sardines skinned and boned, and one teaspoonful of lemon juice. Pound these into a smooth paste. When using for sandwich filling spread one-half the bread with the paste and the other half with a thin layer of minced onion or mashed-hard cooked egg.

Cheese Butter.

Mash together one-half cupful of American cheese and one-half cupful of butter. Spread one-half the sandwich with tart jelly and the other with the cheese mixture. Crackers or saltines may be used, and any snappy cheese.

Orange Butter.

Beat to a cream one-fourth pound of butter, the yolks of three eggs, one cupful of powdered sugar, the grated rind and juice of an orange. Cook over hot water, stirring all the time until the mixture is thick.

Shrimp Butter.

Take one cupful of cooked shrimps, salt and a few dashes of cayenne. Pound in a mortar, mix with an equal portion of butter and one-fourth cupful of lemon juice or tarragon vinegar to moisten.

Peanut Butter and Fruit.

Take one-fourth cupful of figs and raisins, two tablespoonfuls of light sirup, one-half teaspoonful of salt and one-half cupful of peanut butter. Put the fruit in the food chopper, add the other ingredients and mix well.

Fans in the East

Fans have been made of many materials, feathers, tortoise shell, ivory, sandalwood, paper and many fabrics. In Japan there is a fan for almost every use one can think of, such as the tea fan, the court fan, the kitchen fan, and the dancing fan. The fan in Japan and China is not a part, merely, of feminine apparel, being an article of use carried by mistress, maid, priest and soldier.

Mother's Dream

By DOUGLAS MALLOCH

MOTHER does not dream of fame
  So much, how great, how far;
Mother thinks about your name,
  Yet only what you are.
She would rather have you known
  For kindness to a few,
Than to have you on a throne,
  And have men hating you.

Mother does not dream of gold
  So much, if great or small;
She would rather have you hold
  Your honor first of all.
She would rather have you poor
  Than have you rich in sin;
All the wealth that will endure
  Is the wealth within.

Mother does not dream of place
  So much, of social ends;
Gentle women, men of grace,
  She would have your friends.
She would rather have you one
  All you meet esteem,
Just a good and loving son—
  That is Mother's dream.

ONCE WEALTHY MAN ADMITS HE STOLE FROM HIS FRIENDS

Voluntarily Confesses He Embezzled $500,000 by Unsecured Notes.

Chicago.—Once a millionaire, now caught in the deflated real estate market, Charles F. Glaeser, fifty-six, a lawyer, who for years operated a mortgage loan and real estate investment house, confessed voluntarily to State's Attorney Swanson that he has embezzled approximately $500,000.

Hundreds of relatives, friends and business associates, who placed implicit confidence in him, are the victims.

"I'm not a crook," Glaeser told the state's attorney. "I never intended to defraud, but I got involved deeper and deeper. I tried to hide from myself how bad business conditions were. I thought I could pay everything back, but now I'm beyond my depth."

Sells Unsecured Notes.

The embezzlement, Glaeser confessed, began several years ago, when needing cash, he issued real estate notes with no collateral backing them.

He sold them at a discount, paid the interest himself, and when the notes came due, paid them off, issuing new notes which were taken by other investors.

Glaeser's reputation for honesty was so great that investors accepted the notes without question. Had they troubled to investigate, they could easily have ascertained that the mortgage- the notes were supposed to represent did not exist.

"I started in business in the late '90s among the German people in Lake View," said Glaeser. "Up to 1922 I had built up a good reputation selling first and second mortgages and dealing in real estate. My clients believed in me and trusted me. Many of them were my friends for many years, or my relatives.

"All this trouble started so many years ago I don't remember why I started it. But I do remember the first transactions that I got into were of this nature: I forged some mortgage notes.

Gave 10 Per Cent Interest.

"I made up the mortgage in the usual form, signed it myself, had it secured by a trust deed and then sold the notes to my clients, who accepted them without question. As I remember, those first notes were $10,000 notes. Of course, there was never any actual real estate to secure the trust deed.

"Once I began it, it got away from me. It rolled up like a snowball. I was granting high rates of interest, as high as 10 per cent a year, and when the coupons came in I would pay them myself. But in order to do this I had to forge more mortgages. And then these mortgages would come due, demanding still more money."

Poland's Hangman Says He's World's Worst Paid

Warsaw, Poland.—Poland's official executioner complained bitterly to the government that he is the "worst paid hangman in the world."

Asking that his pay—$15 for each person executed—be increased, the executioner pointed out that he has become so destitute that the government seized his furniture and auctioned it off to meet delinquent taxes.

He explained that he has hanged only 80 persons so far in 1932 "and that doesn't constitute a living wage."

LIGHTS of NEW YORK

By WALTER TRUMBULL

Joseph V. McKee, present mayor of New York, told me recently that he believed opportunity never had been so bright for youngsters as it is today. He said there was no limit to where industry, ability and character might take them. He emphasized the room at the top by pointing out that of all the millions of men in the United States those considered of Presidential timber in both the great political parties could be counted on one man's fingers.

• • •

Herbert Bayard Swope also believes that this is an era of opportunity for youngsters. He says those starting the game of life at this particular time will be stronger men, because they will have to be. Only the best and hardiest will survive.

They treat it according to various theories, but do not actually know why it comes or why it goes. • • •

The man who related this story told it of Lewis Perry, head of Phillips Exeter academy. Whether it is true, I don't know, but it might happen to any educator. Anyhow, when he was young, Doctor Perry is supposed to have laid out a course of forty-minute lectures, which he figured would give him material enough to talk once a week from September to May. According to the story, he had all the notes written consecutively in a small book. He started off nobly and talked fast. When he exhausted the notes for the first lecture, he looked at his watch and saw that five minutes had gone, so he used the notes for the second lecture. At the end of eighteen minutes, he was through January. At the thirty-five minute mark, he had reached May and was out of notes, with five minutes to go. He spoke a bit extemporaneously and then inquired whether anybody wanted to ask any questions. Nobody asked any questions, so he dismissed the class. One student lingered. This was highly gratifying. Here was one boy who wished to discuss matters.

"Is there any way," said the student diffidently, "that I can get out of this course?"

I know many an inexperienced talker who has blithely agreed to speak to a gathering for thirty minutes, and has found himself in the same fix. Unless the subject matter is written out and has been timed, the minutes commence to drag by on leaden feet. In the early days of radio, I carelessly consented to speak for fifteen minutes. At the end of seven minutes, I was all through. How I filled the remaining time, and what I said I never have been able to remember. I know I wished intensely that I could sing a song, but I couldn't think of any song and, besides, my family never has permitted me to sing without active protest.

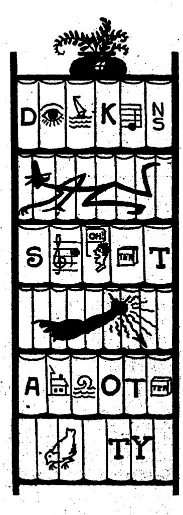
Fun for All the Children
Edited by DOROTHY EDMONDS



THE BOOK WORM'S TRAVELS

A book worm wiggled his way one night
Straight through a jacket all new and bright
Of a brand new book just brought from town
For a dear little girl in a bright blue gown.
"Tomorrow," she said, "I will read it through From cover to cover all crisp and new."
The bookworm heard her and chortled he,
"No better a time than the present for me,
I'll get to the truth of this tale right soon,
And I hope my digestion will keep in tune."
Digestion or not, he went on in,
And ate, and ate, and ate with a vim.
And when on the morrow that beautiful child
Picked up her story, she found it wild.
Or mild if you like, for the truth was gone
And only the trimmings were left at dawn.

A SHELF OF BOOKS

Here is a shelf full of books. A strange looking shelf it is too, but each shelf, by means of the pictures on it, represents the name of an author. All but the last one are very well known. You may have to guess awhile for the one on the last shelf, although its picture is the easiest of all. The name of the author is exactly as the picture shows it. There, have we told you too much?

A BOOKPLATE FOR YOU

It is not much fun to have nice books and then have careless friends borrow them, forgetting to return them, now is it. They won't forget if your name is inside. Copy, or rather trace the plate shown here, as many times as you have books, and write your name in the space under where it says "My Book." Paste the plate in the inside of your book covers and then there will be no doubt as to whom the book belongs.

The Kitchen Cabinet

Food Suggestions

AS WHOLE boiled hams in cans have been on the market some time, most cooks know about them and realize that they are rather expensive, but very convenient in an emergency. The same is true of chicken, all cooked and ready to serve. The price is not unreasonable and counting time and fuel, for many housewives, such a dish is not an extravagance.

The colorful fruit garnishes that are on the market make most delightful dishes when served with a spoonful or two. The small seedless grape is colored green, ruby red or orange, so that one may have any color needed to harmonize with the dish served. Grapefruit with a spoonful of the lucious green globules, or a fruit cocktail with a dash of any of the colors is most attractive. One may buy cubed pineapple now in various colors in cans small enough not to make them too expensive.

A fruit compote is always seasonable and always enjoyed.

Orange Compote.

Cut six peeled oranges into sections, removing the inner pulp. Boil one-half pound of sugar and one-fourth of a cupful of water for eight minutes, add the juice of a lemon and the orange sections a few at a time. Simmer gently for twenty minutes. Remove the oranges to a deep dish and pour the sirup over them. Chill thoroughly and serve with boiled rice.

For use in winter prepare some:

Jellied Mint Sauce.

Simmer one bunch of mint with one cupful of brown sugar, one cupful of vinegar, one and one-half cupfuls of water for thirty minutes, then strain. Add five and one-half cupfuls of granulated sugar, stirring until dissolved. When it comes to a rolling boil remove from the fire and add a bottle of pectin; boil one-half minute, remove from the fire and let stand a minute while skimming. Pour into glasses in which sprigs of fresh mint have been placed. Seal as usual with paraffin.

Son of Anton Lang College Professor

Oberammergau Youth Joins Georgetown Faculty.

Washington.—Anton Lang, Jr., twenty-seven-year-old son of the peasant potter of Oberammergau, whose fame is flung throughout Christendom for his portrayal of the Christus in the "Passion Play," has joined the faculty of Georgetown university as professor of German.

The serious young man who first encountered the hustle and bustle of American life as a student at Holy Cross college, where he was graduated in 1928 with the degree of bachelor of arts, brings word that the citizens of his Bavarian village are planning even now for the next presentation of the famous drama to be given in the summer of 1934.

This occasion, marking the tricentennial anniversary of the first Passion Play, is an unusual departure in time, for it has been presented only at ten-year periods, the latest being in 1930.

Film Offers Refused.

He said the village again would turn down any offer of motion pictures of the drama in 1934, as was done before when economic conditions were acute.

"Our people will never permit the Passion Play to be commercialized in the movies, no matter how much the villagers need the money," he explained.

During the nearly four years since his departure from the United States Lang has been living in the peace of his Alpine village, pursuing postgraduate work. Like his famous father, he speaks English with scarcely an accent. But unlike his father, whose long hair and flowing beard suggests some of the older Italian paintings of Jesus, the son seems typical of the younger generation.

Dislikes Automobiles.

Through his former two years' residence in this country Lang is used to American ways, but is frank in saying he will never become accustomed to American automobiles, which he believes have "taken all the romance away."

He came to Washington direct from Oberammergau, where his parents, two brothers and three sisters live. As all the other members of the Lang family—there are 22 in the village bearing the name, and his relatives number about 150—he has taken part himself in the Passion Play. He was a member of the orchestra in 1930.

His father, who has played the Christus three times—more often than any other man—spoke the prologues for the various scenes in the last enactment.

Clean Shave Almost Cost Him Rhodes Scholarship

Columbus, Ohio.—For want of a mustache, Fred Fricken, mathematics instructor at Ohio State university, almost lost a Rhodes scholarship, which includes two years study and living expenses at Oxford university, England. He had sent a portrait of himself with a mustache. Later he shaved it off. Then upon his appearance for examination, the judges failed to identify him. However, a former professor vouched for Fricken. Now, just as a precaution, Fricken is regrowing the mustache.

Only One Resident Is Living in "Ghost" Town

Denver, Colo.—Only one of the 6,000 persons who once sought gold in the rolling mining town of Nevadaville, high in the Colorado mountains 40 miles west of Denver, still lives in that ghost town.

He is Leonard Nicholls, an old-time miner who has "stuck on" now for 50 years. Even the mayor lives and works in Central City, a mile down the rocky gulch.

Eighteen years ago Nevadaville held its last election and selected a full complement of officers. Only three of the men chosen at that time are still living, and only one still serves in his official capacity.

He is John Doran, who with his hold-ever privileges, actually is mayor, city clerk, assessor, treasurer, marshal, fire chief, and the board of trustees. The town still receives about $200 a year as its share of the taxes of Gilpin county. Each year the fund is spent in the same way.

Nicholls is awarded a contract to maintain the road through the sleeping town. He is paid by warrants issued on the treasurer. Doran issues the warrant and signs it as mayor and town clerk and then countersigns it as the town treasurer.

Until three years age there had been no one to pay the taxes in this "ghost" camp. So Gilpin county put the whole town on sale at auction, and the Quartz Hill Mining company bought it for $1,000.

How It Started

By JEAN NEWTON

Calling It "Algebra"

THE young high school student who glibly reels off his "x's" and "y's" in an endeavor to locate an unknown quantity little realizes the illustrious footsteps in which he treads.

For algebra was presented to us almost bodily by the Arabs, who during the Middle ages achieved world-wide pre-eminence for their distinctive investigations into the fields of mathematics and chemistry.

The word itself is a combination of the Arabic article "al," meaning "the" and "jebr," meaning "reduction" (by equations.))

The Black Box of Silence

SYNOPSIS.

Owen Landis, young inventor, has developed an extraordinary "silencer," which is stolen from a safe in his laboratory. Landis tells Wally Markham, his chum, the only person, beside himself, knowing the combination of the safe, is Betty Lawson, with whom the inventor is in love. Markham takes a plaster cast of a woman's footprint, found beneath the window of the laboratory, and takes an opportunity to fit it to one of Betty's shoes. They are identical. Betty tells Markham Herbert Canby, a stranger, posing as a "promoter," had driven her home the previous night, and that she had dozed in the car. Markham does not tell Landis of his discovery. Vaguely suspicious of Canby's honesty, he searches his hotel room, in his absence, finding two loaded automatic revolvers and a complete set of burglar's tool. Canby brings the revolvers and burglar's kit to the hotel clerk, claiming to have just found them in his room. That night the safe in the bank at Perthdale is blown open and looted, the noise of the explosion being unheard. Satisfied that his "black box" is in the hands of crooks, Landis, with Markham, goes to Perthdale. Three strangers, claiming to be business men of Louisville, are the only possible suspects.

"All right; we'll cross that off. Next comes this shifty bit of business in Chillicothe yesterday; selling one car and buying another; and the split and pick-up at the town where the last bank was touched off. And, back of that there's the fact that we trailed them out of two other towns where smashes occurred. Rather too many coincidences, don't you think? We may have been chasing the wrong bunch; I'll admit it looks that way now. But the fact remains that we've been right on the heels of some bunch that has been raising cain with these country-town banks, and doing it with the help of something that blots out noise. And the last of these cain-raisings is only a few miles—and hours—behind us right now."

"Well, where does that leave us?"

"Pretty well up in the air, I'll have to admit. We've been concentrating so pointedly upon these three Louisville chaps that we haven't been able to see the wood for the trees."

A few minutes later, when they were settling their bill, the clerk said, "You were inquiring about these three Louisville gentlemen who left this morning. Are they friends of yours?"

"Not exactly friends," Markham evaded. "But we are slightly acquainted in Louisville."

"I see," said the clerk. "You may overtake 'em yet. Somewhere east of this their car gave out, and two of 'em decided to quit and take to the railroad. But the other was game; sold the disabled machine, bought another, and wired the train-takers to stop off and let him pick 'em up—which they did."

"That's that," said Landis, as they turned away.

"One little flaw in that story," Markham criticized. "It was the two train-takers who sold the disabled auto; not the one who bought the new one."

"I noticed that; but I guess it merely means that the clerk didn't get the story quite straight."

They found chairs in a quiet corner of the lobby. After a thoughtful interval, Landis said, "I'm on the fence again, Wally. What you said—that we've been right on the heels of some bunch that is pulling off these mysterious burglaries—is the one fact that can't be ignored. But I don't want to drag you into it any further. Suppose you turn me loose and go on back home. It's like this; these bank-blasters, whoever they are, have my black box. I'm confident of it. The chances are they'll keep on going west. I can't quit while there is a chance of catching up with them; that's my responsibility. If you go home, I'll take the railroad and go on."

"Huh"—disgustedly. "Think I'd let you do that? Not much! We'll stick it out together, and, that being the case, we may as well go get the car."

The garage was at the rear of the hotel, and as they were turning the corner, Markham saw a handsome limousine pull up at the hotel entrance. Markham caught a fleeting glimpse of the driver.

"You go on, Owen," he said, "and let me go back and get some cigars. I forgot."

Landis walked on slowly, and in a few minutes Markham reappeared, saying, "You can't guess what I went back for? Did you see the car that came up as we came out?"

"I didn't notice it particularly. Was it the Fleetwing?"

"No; it was Canby's Nordyke. Thought I recognized him as he got out and I went back to see if I was right. I was."

"Canby? What is he doing here in St. Joseph?"

"That's what I wanted to know. He was talking to the clerk when I slipped in, and neither of them saw me. Canby has two passengers."

"People from home?"

"Very much people from home; Betty and her father, if you'll believe it."

Landis stopped short and faced about. He would have gone back to the hotel if Markham hadn't caught and hold him.

"No use; you're too late. They've gone. After Canby drove away, I crossed the lobby and asked the clerk for a match. He said, 'By George! I thought you and your friend had gone. There was a gentleman just now asking for you, and I told him you'd left not five minutes before. He said he was sorry, and then he asked about those three Louisville men you were inquiring about; when they came, and how long they'd been gone.' I could see he had his curiosity aroused, but I didn't say anything."

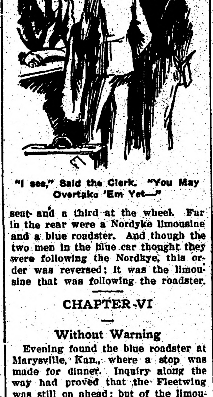
"What does Canby know about the Louisville men, Wally?" Landis asked.

"That's just what I'd like to know, Owen. And, added to that, how he knew they'd been here in St. Joseph, and how he knew we'd been here."

Landis' eyes, the dreamy eyes of the inventor and research student, grew thoughtful. "I think we are justified in going on," he said; and, as the blue car turned into the main street, "I wish Betty and the professor had turned that fellow down when he asked them to drive with him. I don't trust him, Wally."

Crossing the river to Elwood, on the Kansas side of the Missouri, they soon learned that a Fleetwing had gone west earlier in the day; also that a Nordyke limousine had followed within the last half hour.

So it came about that, later in the afternoon, three cars might have been seen speeding over the Pike's Peak highway. Well in the lead was a Fleetwing, with two men in the rear seat and a third at the wheel. Far in the rear were a Nordyke limousine and a blue roadster. And though the two men in the blue car thought they were following the Nordkye, this order was reversed; it was the limousine that was following the roadster.



"I see," Said the Clerk. "You May Overtake 'Em Yet—"

CHAPTER VI

Without Warning

Evening found the blue roadster at Marysville, Kan., where a stop was made for dinner. Inquiry along the way had proved that the Fleetwing was still on ahead; but of the limousine they had heard nothing.

Confident, however, that theirs was the rearmost of the three cars, they covered another hundred miles before stopping for the night in a small town. Since there was no public garage, they put the roadster under a shed in the tavern yard, where the innkeeper assured them it would be safe, and went to bed.

The next morning, at breakfast, the innkeeper burst in upon them to ask if they had locked the car before leaving it.

"I didn't," said Markham promptly. "Why?"

"'Cause it's gone, slick and clean! Whadda you know about that? My land! Nothin' like that's ever happened here before. You go on and finish eatin' an' I'll get to work on the phone."

"Which means?" Landis queried, after the landlord had gone.

"It may mean nothing more than an ordinary car theft."

Landis shook his head. "I'm afraid not. I'm thinking it means that somebody wants to leave us stranded."

"The three men in the Fleetwing?"

"Hardly, you'd say. Apart from the fact that they've been identified as respectable citizens, unless everybody has been lying to us, they are hours ahead of us—and have been ever since we left St. Joseph. Canby is the man we haven't been able to locate."

"Oh, no, not Canby. You are forgetting that he has Betty and her father with him."

"I know. But, in spite of that, he is keeping tab on us, or trying to. Otherwise he wouldn't have asked about us in the St. Joseph hotel. That looks as if he might have been following us, doesn't it?"

"Why should he follow us?"

Landis shrugged. "I'm no mind-reader. There are times when I wish I were—and this is one of them."

Since the perturbed tavern keeper was likely to do everything possible to trace the car stolen from his premises, they took their time over breakfast. Then Markham told him he would pay a liberal reward for information; after which they went to sit on the tavern porch and smoke and wait for results.

"Not that there are likely to be any results," Markham offered. "I've a hunch that we've lost the roadster for good and all."

"Then we are ditched—out of the fight?"

"Not by a d—d sight!" was the snappy denial. "We are going to see this thing through now if it takes all summer! If we don't hear from the lost car soon, we'll take a train and ride it until we reach some place where I can buy another."

"But see here, Wally—I can't let you do anything like that! As it stands, I'm owing you the price of a car right now."

"Nothing of the sort. You may be calling this jaunt your funeral, but if it is, I'm driving the hearse and we don't stop short of the cemetery gate, at least. Here comes a boy. Maybe he has turned the trick for us."

The boy came runnin' up to the porch, fairly bursting with his news.

"I've f-f-found your car!" he stuttered. "It's in a gully on our farm! C-constable telephoned, and dad said, right away, 'at he thought he heard somethin' go 'squoosh' in the night. It's in a deep place where it tumbled off the road."

"Good boy," said Markham. "The reward is yours. How far is it?"

"It ain't far. C'me on and I'll show you."

A short half mile from town, by the side of a little-used country road, they found the blue roadster. They did not go down into the gully into which it had fallen. From where they stood they could see that it was a wreck.

"A clean job," Markham grunted morosely.

"What do you think?" Landis asked, when they had walked a full half mile in silence.

"Deliberate, of course. The tire tracks in the road showed plainly enough that the car had been stopped, backed and turned quarter way around to head it for the ditch."

"But who did it?"

"I'd be willing to pay another reward to find that out. There's something doing, either ahead of us or behind us; something we're not to be allowed to mess in, if a wrecked car will stop us—which it won't."

Markham arranged to have the car salvaged and held subject to his order, and when the westbound train came along they boarded it. Markham consulted a time-card folder and passed the towns ahead in review.

"Colby, at two-fifty this afternoon," he said. "It's a junction point, and if we can't find what we want, we can get a train from there to Denver. Colby's our drop-off."

Accordingly they debarked at Colby, where Markham found he was able to replace the wrecked roadster with a later model of the same make. Starting without loss of time, they reached Limon, the point at which the two main auto roads, coincident west of Colby, split—one leading southwest to Colorado Springs, and the other northwest to Denver.

At the few stops they had made west of Colby they got no news of the Fleetwing or of Canby's car. But at Limon the lost trail reappeared. The Fleetwing had passed through some six hours earlier on the way to Denver; and Canby's limousine had taken the same route three or four hours later.

Markham looked at his watch. "Both parties are probably stopping over night in Denver. If we push along we can be there by midnight. What do you say?"

"I'm with you. I can spell you at the wheel when you are tired."

It was well past midnight when the lights of Denver came in sight. Reaching the city, Markham turned in at the first all-night garage he came to, and they forthfared, stiff, tired and dusty, to put up at the nearest hotel, and turned in at once.

The attempt to trace three newcomers—or at most six—in a city the size of Denver is much like looking for a needle in a haystack; and though they went short on sleep and were up early the next morning, eight o'clock found them still driving from one hotel to another, drawing blanks and losing time.

"There is simply no end to this, Wally," Landis protested. "We might keep on all day in a city with as many hotels as there are here. Our best chance is the open road. We know where Canby is headed for. If we trail him, maybe we'll find the Fleetwing in the same gallery."

"You didn't beat me to it by more than half a minute," Markham returned, spreading the well-used road map on his knees. "Here's the nearest cut to the Timanyoni," he pointed out. "We'll get the grips and try our luck in the open, as you say."

For a short run over the highway the trail refused to reveal itself. But later they came to a filling station whose keeper told them he had helped change an inner tube on a Fleetwing Eight between six and seven o'clock that morning. He said there were three men in the car, and he also recalled that the one he had helped with the tire had said they were from Louisville.

Questioned, he said he had no recollection of seeing a Nordyke limousine, but that it might easily have gone by without his noticing it.

Markham glanced at the clock on the dash as he flung the new roadster at the mountain grades.

"Three hours ahead of us; we're gaining on them, in spite of the Denver delay. Where do you suppose this chase is going to wind up, Owen?"

"I'm not so much concerned about the 'where' as the 'how.' I may as well confess that I'm on the fence again. There haven't been any bank blastings this side of the Missouri river."

Relief From Neuralgia In Few Minutes

Quick Dissolving Property of BAYER ASPIRIN Starts Relief 3 or 4 Minutes After Taking

Think of a headache going in three or four minutes. The pains of neuralgia, neuritis or rheumatism being eased, often, in that little space of time!

Due to important, scientific developments in the famous Bayer Aspirin laboratories, millions of people are enjoying this almost unbelievably quick relief from pain.

That is because Bayer Aspirin dissolves almost instantly in the stomach. And thus almost INSTANTLY starts to ease pain. The average headache, for instance, eases in as little as four or five minutes. Think of what a time saver this is to busy people.

Remember it is Genuine BAYER Aspirin which provides this unique property. So see that you get the real article when you buy. See that these three words "Genuine Bayer Aspirin" are on any box or bottle of aspirin that you buy. And that the name "Bayer" is stamped in the form of a cross on any tablet that you take.

Remember that when you buy. And remember, too, that Genuine Bayer Aspirin cannot harm the heart. Take care you get the genuine.

NO TABLETS ARE GENUINE BAYER ASPIRIN WITHOUT THIS CROSS

Human Muscles

There are between 300 and 400 pairs of muscles and a number of single muscles in the human body.

Scientists feed 50 babies...

to help you feed yours

YOU can't nurse your baby? Then read of a recent feeding test conducted by two eminent baby specialists. Let their findings help you decide—what milk for my baby.

For a test, fifty average babies were chosen. Into their bottles—through the months of the test—went a milk known to millions of mothers and grandmothers in this country as a wonderful baby builder.

That milk was Eagle Brand. Eagle Brand was the only food these babies received, except for the usual supplementary foods* now given even with mother's milk.

And how those babies were studied! Regularly, X-Ray pictures of bones were taken. Tooth development was watched. Weights and heights recorded. Blood counts made. And all these results were compared with other groups of babies, similarly fed on other foods.

What the test showed

At last came the verdict: Measured by every scientific test, the result was favorable to Eagle Brand. This simple diet—Eagle Brand with the usual supplementary foods*—had proved equal to the building of 100% babies.

Send for FREE baby booklet

If you cannot nurse your baby, try Eagle Brand. Next to mother's milk, it is the easiest form of milk in the world to digest.

Millions of babies have been raised on it—babies whose strong, healthy constitutions—sound teeth—straight bones—firm muscles—are living proof of its benefits.

Just follow simple directions on label. And send for "Baby's Welfare", an 80-page guide-book on raising a baby.

A report of the physicians' test will be sent your doctor, on request.

*The usual supplementary foods, of course, are orange or tomato juice, and cod liver oil or other source of the anti-rachitic vitamin D.

POULTRY

NOT HARD MATTER TO PREVENT MOLT

Careful Feeding and Use of Lights Important.

By PROF. L. E. WEAVER, New York State College of Agriculture.—WNU Service.

The molt is an old custom among hens and is adhered to by every avian female. But the molting season is costly to the poultryman unless he can frustrate the hen's or pullet's idea of stopping laying while the old plumage is shed and a new, glossy coat is grown in the fall.

If a pullet lays two or three months prior to the usual molting season, she is likely to follow the example of the older hens and molt, too, and lay no eggs for the five or six weeks' molting period. If the pullet starts to lay just before or during the normal molting season, she will continue to lay. Many poultrymen hatch their chicks late in the season to avoid the molt; but, under those circumstances, the late-hatched pullets do not begin to lay full-sized eggs until egg prices start to fall. The early hatched pullets are the ones that lay full-sized eggs when eggs are high-priced and make money for the poultryman, if they do not molt.

Get the pullets to eat all the feed they can, for they will not get too fat. Be sure they have all the dry mash they want at all times; and, as soon as the pullets begin to lay, wet mash can be fed, in addition, once a day. If possible, mix the wet mash with milk, for milk helps keep the flock healthy. Lights may be used to give about 13 hours of daylight, starting about two weeks after the pullets are put into laying houses. "Plenty of green food, especially cabbage, helps to keep the flock in good condition and to prevent the molt.

Care of Birds Before and After Caponizing

Cockerels can be caponized successfully late in the season if care is taken to handle the birds properly. Not more than 10 or 12 birds should be confined together. They should be kept without feed for 24 hours before the operation. Afterwards they should be given a light feeding of moist mash consisting of bran and ground oats moistened with skimmilk. Plenty of clean water should be provided.

A condition known as wind puffs is likely to develop a few days after the operation. This is nothing serious and can be ignored for eight to ten days. By this time the incision between the ribs will have healed and if the outer skin is punctured the air will be released. Capons outsell cockerels for enough to pay for cost and trouble of caponizing.—Prairie Farmer.

Feed for Molting Hens

Hens that are molting should be fed a good laying ration. Cutting down the amount of protein will slow up the growth of feathers and they will not get back to production so soon. If the hens do not get enough protein they will grow feathers at the expense of body weight and then body weight must be built up before they can produce eggs again.

If the birds are losing weight, feed them at noon each day a mixture of equal parts of cornmeal, rolled oats and condensed milk, say Penn State poultry specialists.—American Agriculturist.

Poultry Hints

Poultry manure should be collected from the dropping boards, stored under cover and mixed with dry earth or sand.

* * *

To maintain a high level of egg production, it is not necessary to cull more than a third of the birds from a normal flock of chickens during the year.

* * *

The best pen of birds in the Illinois egg-laying contest for the month of June was White Leghorns owned by Logan Leghorn farm, Parnell, Mo. This pen laid 145 eggs.

* * *

Average returns on 123 flocks of Ohio poultry last year was 70 cents per bird.

* * *

A normal healthy hen will produce about 80 pounds of moist or wet manure in the course of a year, which should convince farmers of the great value of farm flocks.

* * *

Each student in the winter short course in poultry at the New York State College of Agriculture is assigned the entire care of a small flock for four weeks of his course.

* * *

Green alfalfa, fed liberally, has been recommended for checking the death of poultry due to poor feeding.

* * *

Clean litter on the floor every day in the year makes the poultry house more sanitary and helps in keeping the flock healthy.

* * *

Unless turkeys are well fleshed and have a covering of fat under the skin, they usually sell as undergrades. The same is true if they are full of pinfeathers even though they may be in fair condition

DAIRY

CONTENT OF MILK CERTAIN TO VARY

Many Factors in Butterfat Production.

By FRED M. HAIG, Associate Professor of Dairying, North Carolina State College.—WNU Service.

While dairymen ponder the cause of variation in the butterfat content of milk from the same breed of cows and between individual cows of the same breed, investigation shows there are at least ten different factors associated in this cause.

When we consider the single milkings of individual cows, the butterfat content varies from about 2 per cent to 10 per cent. The first of these factors is of course the influence of the individuality of a cow. Seldom do we find two cows, even of the same breed, whose milk contains the same amount of fat. Then there is the influence of the breed. When the average of several cows in the same breed is taken, there will usually be a fairly uniform difference between two breeds. The age of the cow also has effect. The milk is usually less rich in fat with each succeeding period of lactation. As each lactation period advances, however, the amount of fat increases as the stage of lactation becomes more advanced. This is especially apparent after the third month.

In addition to these four influences, we find the difference in time between milkings has some effect, and milking at regular intervals gets best results. The last milk drawn from the udder is richer than the first few streams and shows why a cow should be thoroughly stripped. A cow in good flesh will produce more milk and fat than a thin one. Dairy cows should not be allowed to get too fat, but they should be kept in good condition.

Records of Purebreds Well Worthy of Study

Purebred cows gave, on the average, 1,110 pounds more milk and 31 pounds more butterfat in a year than grade cows, according to a summary of the records of more than 30,000 cows in the New York state dairy herd improvement associations, reports Prof. W. T. Crandall of the New York State College of Agriculture. The study also showed that, on the average, cows make their best and most profitable production at from six to eight years of age. Forty-seven per cent of the cows in the associations were from two to four years of age and only 28 per cent from six to eight years of age. The replacement and depreciation in New York state herds could be reduced if more good heifers were raised and if diseases were better controlled, he says, for the good cows would remain longer in herds than they do nowadays.

Plan Ahead

"To be wise in time," says Professor Eckles, Minnesota specialist, "applies to cow owners as well as to the affairs of government. The farmer who waits until cold weather before planning what to feed during the winter, is not wise in time.

"Experienced dairy cattle feeders the world over have learned the foundation of a good dairy ration must be a succulent feed of some kind and a legume hay. To provide this foundation for successful feeding means either corn silage or roots for the succulent feed, and clover or alfalfa for hay.

"The farmer who neglects to provide in time for enough of these necessities will find himself next winter without a satisfactory ration, and must either be content with a small cream or milk check or be willing to go to the feed store and spend good money for feed to balance up his ration."—Exchange.

DAIRY FACTS

Milk absorbs odors quickly, therefore it should not be kept in the barn in open pails or cans.

* * *

The principle of correct feeding applies to all kinds of live stock, the same as to dairy cows.

* * *

If the separator is cold, a gallon of hot water run through it will warm it up to the proper separating temperature.

* * *

Most separators are adjusted at the factory to skim cream testing about 35 per cent butterfat, and this gives about the most satisfactory results.

* * *

Cream testing too high causes more waste by sticking to the separator bowl, buckets and cans; but may be better for special market conditions.

* * *

After calves have been fed whole milk for five or six weeks, they may be continued on calf meal gruel, grain and hay.

* * *

Corn may be cut at various stages of maturity and ensiled under varying conditions, and in most cases satisfactory ensilage is obtained.

* * *

A good quality of silage can be made from slightly frozen material of good quality. Apparently slight freezing has very little detrimental effect on corn for silage.

How Modern Women Lose Pounds of Fat Swiftly—Safely

Gain Physical Vigor — Youthfulness With Clear Skin and Vivacious Eyes That Sparkle With Glorious Health

Here's the recipe that banishes fat and brings into blossom all the natural attractiveness that every woman possesses.

Every morning take one-half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water before breakfast—cut down on pastry and fatty meats—go light on potatoes, butter, cream and sugar—in 4 weeks get on the scales and note how many pounds of fat have vanished.

Get a bottle of Kruschen Salts—the cost is trifling and it lasts 4 weeks. If even this first bottle doesn't convince you this is the easiest, safest and surest way to lose fat—if you don't feel a superb improvement in health—so gloriously energetic—vigorously alive—your money gladly returned.

But be sure for your health's sake that you ask for and get Kruschen Salts. Get them at any drugstore in the world.

"Electric Chair" for Insects

An "electric chair" for mosquitoes and other insects and pests was recently devised at a tree research laboratory. The "chair" is a large square with two sides made of extremely fine wire. A current is passed through these sides, killing all insects alighting thereon. A weak current is used, running from an electric bulb socket through a transformer into the wire gauze. During the day, bait is used to attract the insects; at night, a light is placed inside the "chair."—New York Times.

A great virtue is cheerfulness.

Grandfather of "Billy" Sunday Versatile Man

My grandfather was the most versatile man I have ever known. There was seemingly nothing that he could not make. He made wagons, the wheels and all parts of them. He could build houses and lay stone walls. He made a turning lathe and made bedposts, spindles for banisters, made bureaus, water wheels and many other things.

He had a blacksmith shop and made horseshoes and wedges with which to split wood. He could dress a millstone on which to grind corn and wheat. Before he built the mill for sawing lumber and grinding grain, he and the neighbors had to drive to Burlington, 200 miles away, to mill. He made all the ax handles sold by the hardware stores in Ames, Iowa.

He made a loom upon which grandmother spun yarn and made cloth, from which she made dresses and cloth for suits. My clothes were made from homespun until I was sent to the orphans' home. While the clothes were ill-fitting affairs, they were warm. You couldn't tell from looking at my pants whether I was going or coming.—Rev. William A. (Billy) Sunday in the Ladies' Home Journal.

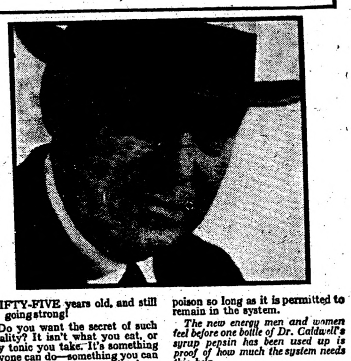
Measure for Life's Span

Sir William Mulock, speaking jocularly at a banquet in Orillia, remarked that the best way to live a long time is to select good healthy parents. As a matter of fact, the best rough-and-ready test of a person's probable span of life is to add together the ages of parents and grandparents and divide it by six.—Toronto Mail and Empire.

No one cares what a man's age is, if he doesn't look it.

No book of etiquette is needed for the children in a good family.

Stronger than He Was at Twenty



FIFTY-FIVE years old, and still going strong!

Do you want the secret of such vitality? It isn't what you eat, or any tonic you take. It's something anyone can do—something you can start today and see results in a week! All you do is give your vital organs the right stimulant.

A famous doctor discovered the way to stimulate a sluggish system to new energy. It brings fresh vigor to every organ. Being a physician's prescription, it's quite harmless. Tell your druggist you want a bottle of Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin. Get the benefit of its fresh laxative herbs, active senna, and that pure pepsin. Get that lazy liver to work, those stagnant bowels into action. Get rid of waste matter that is slow poison so long as it is permitted to remain in the system.

The new energy men and women feel before one bottle of Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin has been used up is proof of how much the system needs this help.

Get a bottle of this delicious syrup and let it end that constant worry about the condition of the bowels. Spare the children those bilious days that make them miserable. Save your household from the use of cathartics which lead to chronic constipation. And guard against auto-intoxication as you grow older.

Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin is such a well known preparation you can get it wherever drugs are sold and it isn't expensive.

Most of the sleep after 7 a. m. isn't needed.

Too many men make a "life work" of not believing in religion.

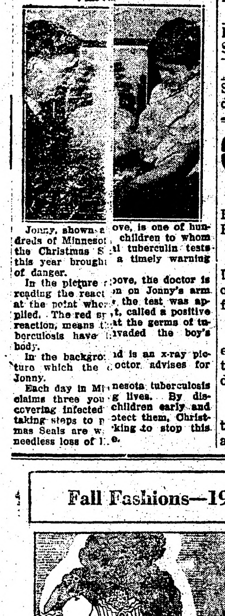
"THAT OUNCE OF PREVENTION"



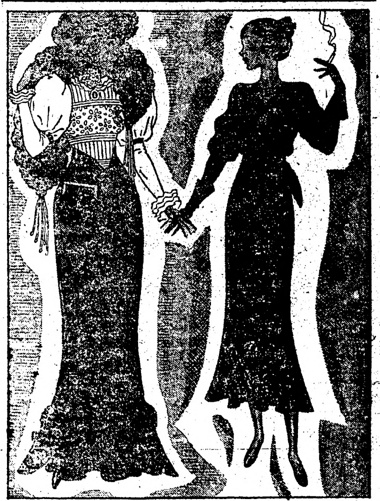
Jonny, shown above, is one of hundreds of Minnesota children to whom the Christmas Seal tuberculin tests this year brought a timely warning of danger.

In the picture above, the doctor is reading the reaction on Jonny's arm at the point where the test was applied. The red spot, called a positive reaction, means that the germs of tuberculosis have invaded the boy's body.

In the background is an x-ray picture which the doctor advises for Jonny.

Each day in Minnesota tuberculosis claims three young lives. By discovering infected children early and taking steps to protect them, Christmas Seals are working to stop this needless loss of life.

Fall Fashions—1932 vs. Gay 90's



FASHION news reports from style centers pertaining to the new autumn mode say that the cigarette silhouette is to rule in new fall frocks for the modern miss, with the full sleeve created to accentuate the cigarette silhouette.

As this study in styles indicates, a full sleeve is just as full of shirred textile under one name as another. The Victorian vamp of the gay 90's was proud of her leg o' mutton sleeves and this autumn Miss America of 1932 will simply dote on the dolman sleeve. The dolman sleeve is in fact a healthy juvenile balloon-sleeve well on its way to full-bloomed maturity.

Of course, forty years ago, when the leg o' mutton sleeve was all the rage, cigarettes would never have been mentioned in connection with styles. The belles of that era did not smoke since the raw tobaccos used in making old fashioned cigarettes did not have the mildness which the toasting process gives to the modern cigarette which Miss America of 1932 prefers. But the descriptive term seems applied quite naturally to the modern straight and youthful silhouette which is inspiring the fall mode.

The dolman sleeve in its design permits the style creators to narrow the bodice lines by crowding the shirred sleeve-top in toward the center of both front and back, thus giving the effect of an eight-inch wide front and back and creating the straight line essential in the cigarette silhouette.

Boys Offered Best Stories

Bad times are good times for magazine readers, according to the editor of youth's favorite magazine, THE AMERICAN BOY-YOUTH'S COMPANION. More people are writing than ever before, he states, and finer adventure, more gripping yarns, more downright reading thrills are due the magazine subscriber than ever in history.

THE AMERICAN BOY-YOUTH'S COMPANION in 1933 will be loaded from cover to cover with great experiences. For adventure, the reader will travel with the Royal Canadian Mounted through forests and mountains, penetrate to the military posts of Borneo; ride with cavalry in India, plunge into the Amazon jungle.

There'll be character-building stories of the professions, of school and college life. There'll be articles on sports, travel and science, that take boys to the Orient, that explain the mysteries of ocean liners and air transports. There'll be stories that satisfy the boy's wholesome appetite for fun and thrill, and his keen desire to learn.

THE AMERICAN BOY-YOUTH'S COMPANION costs just $2.00 a year or $3.00 for three years. In other words, when you subscribe for three years, the magazine's savings enable them to give you a subscription for only a dollar a year! It's the ideal gift for that boy you're interested in, be he son, nephew, neighbor, cousin, or son of your business associate. And an attractive gift card bearing your name will go to him if you request it. Send your order direct to THE AMERICAN BOY—YOUTH'S COMPANION, 550W. Lafayette Blvd., Detroit, Mich. Service on your subscription will start with the issue you specify. (Adv.)

SCHOOL NOTES

HIGH SCHOOL

This is the end of the six weeks but we are not going to have our Six Weeks' Test until after Thanksgiving vacation, which started yesterday and will continue until Tuesday, Nov. 29.

Grades I and II

Last week there were only four second grade children present. They all had 100 in Spelling on Friday. They are Harriet, Wayne, Ruth and Ruby.

We have been having the recreational type of reading in both grades this week.

In Art Class last week we made dogs from wrapping paper, yarn, and bits of fur. This week we are making roosters and ducks. We find the work different and interesting.

The first grade children have completed their doll house.

The following poems were chosen as best of the original Thanksgiving poetry in Grade II.

THANKSGIVING

Oh, Thanksgiving is a pleasant day.
We always then go out to play.
At dinner we go in and eat
And oh! we have a pleasant treat.
—Wayne Larson

WHEN I GO OUT TO PLAY

One day when I went out to play
The snow was falling, as it may.
I saw the turkey running with tears,
For he was running about in fears. —Ruby Halvorson

Grades III, IV and V

Our room has been making Thanksgiving posters. We are making paper toys now.

The attendance this week has been much better.

Grades VI, VII and VIII

Five pupils have had perfect attendance records so far this year. They are: Alice, Clara E., Eleanor, Adeloyd, and Lowell.

When one of our girls came back after having had the measles, she said: "Having the measles wouldn't be half bad if they didn't have such a homely name."

The Sixth graders in Geography have now finished the study of the new Baltic countries.

Lowell had the best paper in the 7th grade Hygiene test Thursday.

Reminder of Dark Age

Witch-burning days in Scotland were recalled when a human skull was found during excavations at the Bogle hole, Mullesburgh. The Bogle hole was one of the places in Scotland where witches were burned after trial It was known in 1561 as the Terror's Croft. The last recorded trial of persons accused of witchcraft was held in Musselburgh on July 20 1661.

Issued Weekly From The Home Of The Biggest Co-operative Creamery In Marshall County

One Dollar Fifty Per Year In Advance

Tax Collections Decrease

Tax collections decreased $89,883.32 during the period ending November 1, 1932 from the corresponding period in 1931, a summary of the abstract of the November tax settlement for Marshall county compiled in the office of Levi G. Johnson, county auditor, reveals.

During the November settlement period this year the tax collections totaled only $142,065.53, while during a similar period a year ago the collections totaled $231,448.85, records in the county auditor's office show.

This tremendous decrease at first glance might be attributed to a falling off of tax payments by the taxpayers of the county, and, although this fact is quite noticeable, the biggest share of the decrease is the result of the large payments received last year from the Thief Lake restoration project payments and from the Rural Credit department which paid up the taxes on lands held under mortgage up to the time of foreclosure, said H. M. Hanson, deputy auditor.

Public schools of the county are the largest benefactors from the funds derived from the November tax payments, a total of $51,328.97 being paid to the school districts, while the county government will receive the second largest amount or about $50,687.77. The townships and villages of the county will receive $24,116.41 and the state will receive $15,932.38 as its share of the collections, the reports state.

Old Mill Again In Use

The Old Mill which has played an important part in the history of Foldahl township since the early '90s and which has ground flour and feed for hundreds of pioneer Marshall county residents, is again in operation, Skoglund brothers announced today. The mill was started on the banks of the Middle River, using water power in the early part of the 1890's by John Larson. It was later operated as a steam plant mill and now gasoline furnishes the power. The mill has been remodeled during the summer and is now prepared to grind rye or graham flour for the trade. Skoglund brothers also have some flour ground at the mill for sale.——Warren Sheaf.

Village Offices to Be Filled

The offices to be filled at the Village Election next Tuesday are: President of the Village Council for one year; 1 village trustee for 3 years; 1 village clerk for 2 years; 1 village treasurer for 1 year; 1 village assesor for 2 years; 1 justice of peace for 2 years; 1 constable for 2 years; 1 justice of the peace for 1 year and 1 constable for 1 year.

Buying Turkeys

The Carlson Mercantile Co. are again buying turkeys and, have since they started buying on Monday for the Christmas pool, taken in one carload. At Thanksgiving they handled 3 carloads.

W. E. Daly is handling the buying for them for this pool.

The drawing will be held at 3 p. m. at the Engen garage and all those holding trade tickets should deposit them in the jars at the business places before 2:45 o'clock this afternoon.

Standard Oil Discontinues Here

The Standard Oil company which has operated a bulk station here the past fourteen years without a shut down, ordered the station here closed after the first of December. Mr. Erickson who come here from Roseau last spring and has had charge of the companys affairs here since, checked out as their agent on Wednesday. From now on this community will be served from the Middle River station.

The company blamed the high cost of distribution for closing. Their Fargo representative said it cost them 4 cent a gallon sold here to operate a station and the sales are small and few now.

If you want real telephone service just drop a hint that you believe we could have it if, the owners of all the poor lines here sold out to some one like the Garden Valley company. The day of co-operative lines here is shot as the cooperation is all lost thru poor service and non-payment of dues.

To Lecture on Wild Birds

Winter Shows officials have announced Jack Miner, world famous authority on wild birds, and proprietor of the Jack Miner Bird Sanctuary, Kingsville, Ontario, Canada, as one of the features of the forthcoming educational week February 6—10. Mr. Miner has devoted his life to the study of wild fowl, and was the first to domesticate wild geese. His illustrated address is expected to attract visitors from all parts of northwestern Minnesota, where the people are taking an increasing interest in the conservation of wild fowl, fish and game.

For a number of years members of the Izaak Walton League have asked that Jack Miner be invited to attend an annual Valley reunion. Though he has received many invitations this is the first time that the Winter Shows could be included in his speaking program.

Jack Miner's illustrated address will be delivered Wednesday evening, February 8.

The Weather

So for this week the weather man has been fanning us with a warm southern wind that has been so mild that it has actually had a touch of Indian Summer in it. Over half the snow we had has now disappeared and if it was not for the calender one would think it was in the early spring. Only a skim of ice was seen an the water puddles yesterday morning.

Ten Years Through Ups and Downs

It is said what goes up must come down.

This is what happened to prices. Now that prices are down there is only one place they can go and that is up. Now is the time to have a little faith in the future and take advantage of the increases as they come along.

Through all of these ups and downs this bank has continued to serve this community. It has been tested beyond all limits and it is here to serve the people in the same old way.

The bank deeply appreciates the confidence of the people that have made it possible to weather all of these storms.

GEORGE WASHINGTON HONORED BY ITALY

Turin Names Bridge for Our First President.

Washington. — Celebration of the George Washington bicentennial has echoed in Turin, Italy, where a recently completed bridge spanning the River Dora has been named for the first President of the United States.

"Turin (Torino)) has features that remind one of American cities of a half million inhabitants," says a bulletin from the National Geographic society. "It is well laid out with wide streets crossing one another at right angles and many busy squares and spacious parks embellished with from one to four statues.

"A traveler strolling down its clean streets in the shadow of well-kept buildings is hardly aware that Turin and Milan, its neighbor, make up the so-called 'Industrial Twin Cities' of Italy. Out of its huge factories roll automobiles that traverse the famous boulevards of the world, and the products of the silk and cotton mills, leather-goods factories and machine shops find their way into world markets.

Great Industrial Center.

"American industrialists marvel at Turin's industrial importance when they stand on the banks of the Dora and Po rivers which flow past the city. Neither stream is navigable for large commercial craft. No industrial city of a half-million inhabitants in the United States is without water transportation at its disposal.

"Construction of good roads and the increasing use of motor trucks in northern Italy have aided Turin commerce in the last decade, but to the railroads goes the greater part of the credit for the city's industrial and commercial prestige.

"Because it is the first large city in Italy near the Italian end of the Mount Cenis Alps-piercing tunnel, nearly all rail-borne commerce entering Italy from the west, passes Turin. Italian railroads radiate from the city connecting with lines that touch nearly all great cities of Europe. Before the St. Gotthard tunnel was bored, Turin was Italy's leading railroad center. Now it is second to Milan.

"But the traveler is not long in Turin until he is assured that the city is not wholly absorbed in industry and the transportation of its products. In fact, its numerous art galleries, splendid church buildings, museums, and libraries lead one to believe that its industry is perhaps only a means to acquiring and preserving art and diffusing knowledge.

A Treasury of Art.

"The Royal palace, which is a mute reminder of the days when Turin was the capital of the kingdom of Sardinia and capital of Italy, is a treasure chest of historic paintings, handsome statuary, frescoes and tapestries. In one portion of the building there is an armory where historic suits of armor and implements of war are on display. The cathedral adjoining the palace contains a well-executed copy of Leonardo da Vinci's 'Last Supper.' Another of the prized possessions of the edifice is a piece of linen which tradition holds is a part of the shroud in which the body of Jesus was wrapped.

"The Turin Academy of Science has a picture gallery with many works of such famous artists as Van Dyck, Rembrandt and Raphael, and a Museum of Antiquities where are preserved ancient Egyptian tombs dating back to 1600 B. C. The Museum of Ancient and Applied Art contains an interesting collection of musical instruments, ornamental leather, medals, enamels, ivories, and wood carvings and one of the world's unique collections of painted glasses and crystals which records the history of glass painting through the ages. Art objects in clay sculptures in marble and collections of stones, and terra cotta also are on display.

"The Mole Antonelliana, the skyscraper of Turin, was built as a Jewish temple, but it now is a national historical museum where a collection of trophies, flags, weapons, uniforms, and manuscripts illustrating the struggle for a united Italy, is preserved. This building is the highest walled structure in Europe. Its walls rise to within 19 feet of the height of the Washington monument.

"The traveler in search of ancient landmarks in Turin is disappointed. Turin was quite a town when Hannibal destroyed it in the Third century before the Christian era. Later it was the site of a Roman colony, but of this settlement only one of the four great gates of its wall remains."

Invents Device to Test Earth's Radio Activity

Pasadena, Calif.—An amazing array of devices have been evolved at the California Institute of Technology here to test the radio-activity of the earth.

Dr. Robley D. Evans seeks to determine with them the amount of radium in rocks in order to discover how much of this activity must be discounted in studying the action of the cosmic ray, discovered by Dr. Robert A. Millikan, head of Caltech.

Included in Doctor Evans' equipment is a furnace that will make granite boil like water; scales that will weigh one million-millionth of a gram, or one thousand-millionth of a pound of radium, and an apparatus so delicate as to chase atoms of radium through a definite channel in order that scientists may count them.

Doctor Evans pulverizes a granite boulder, heats it to a temperature of 3,700 degrees Fahrenheit, and the rock boils like water. The temperature is measured by an electric device affected by light rays from the lava.

The heat forces out of the gasses formed the negative electron. When the electrons are permitted to reunite with the gasses, they pass into delicate scales, where the radium atoms knock negative electrons from the atoms of air which are within the tube-like scales.

By watching the electromer, the scientist knows from its reading how many atoms are passing through.

COMEBACK OF CZAR IS BALKED

Coburg, Germany.—Marriage here of the Princess Sibylle of Saxe-Coburg to Prince Gustav Adolph Oscar ended a situation that promised to play a big part in the affairs of the kingdom of Bulgaria.

It all centers around the dethroned monarch of Bulgaria, Czar Ferdinand, who, at seventy-two years, still has hopes of returning to his throne at the expense of its present occupant, his son, Boris.

When Ferdinand was exiled he came here to live. Princess Sibylle, then a mere child, became his favorite among all the little royalties who found the old fellow a fairy godfather. As she grew up Ferdinand, eyeing the fruitless quest of King Boris for a bride among the royal houses of Europe, conceived the idea that if Boris married Sibylle the way would be paved for his own return to Bulgaria and—who knew—perhaps to his throne.

Boris had his eye on Sibylle at the time, but he grew suspicious of his father eventually and turned his attention to the Italian royal house whose eldest daughter, Giovanna, finally became his bride. This was a blow to old Ferdinand, for it effected an alliance with the one nation which was most instrumental in seeing that he lost his crown.

Ferdinand was persistent, however. Failing to see Boris marry Sibylle he fancied it might be a good idea if she became the wife of his second son, Prince Cyril. Sibylle might yet wield influence enough to let him go back to Bulgaria.

Again it looks as if Ferdinand was to be disappointed. Prince Cyril, accompanying Boris in his wooing trips to Rome, fell in love with King Emanuel's younger daughter, Maria. She was too young to marry just then, but now she is not and formal announcement of their engagement is expected soon to confirm rumors that it has been arranged—further strengthening the Italian-Bulgarian bonds and handing out another wallop to Ferdinand's hopes.

For all that Sibylle either could not or would not advance those hopes by marrying one of his sons, Ferdinand proved a good sport when she was married the other day.

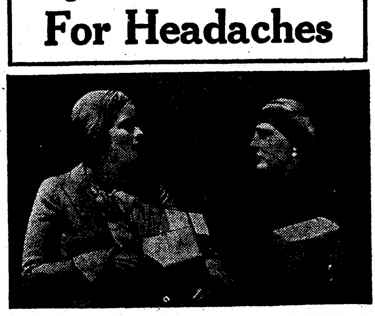
Quicker Relief For Headaches



Because of Quick Dissolving Property BAYER ASPIRIN Starts "Taking Hold" 3 or 4 Minutes After Taking

Due to important, scientific developments in the world-famous Bayer laboratories, almost INSTANT relief from headaches, neuralgia and rheumatic pains is being afforded millions.

Because of a unique process in making and tableting, Genuine Bayer Aspirin is made to dissolve almost INSTANTLY in the stomach. Hence it starts to work almost instantly. And thus "takes hold" of the average pain or headache in as little as three or four minutes after taking. The fastest, safe relief, it is said, ever known for pain.

Remember, it is Genuine Bayer Aspirin which provides this unique, quick-acting property. So be sure you get the Real Article—GENUINE BAYER Aspirin when you buy. Naturally you want the fastest, possible relief—and that's the way to get it.

To identify the genuine, see that any box or bottle of aspirin you buy is clearly marked "Genuine Bayer Aspirin." And that any tablet you take is stamped clearly with the name "Bayer" in the form of a cross. Remember—Genuine Bayer Aspirin cannot harm the heart.

New Death Ray Kills Pests

Tired of the havoc wrought by grubs, caterpillars and green fly in his garden, H. Neal, an electrical engineer of Tunbridge Wells, England, has invented a death ray of his own. By means of an ordinary accumulator connected to special coils he has been able to produce a ray which wipes out insect marauders by the thousands. At a recent demonstration he touched the leaves of plants infested with green fly with a forked copper wand attached to his apparatus. The leaves were not harmed, but the insects died instantly.

A World's Record

MORE than three thousand births without a single loss of either mother or child! That is the official Piatt County record of Dr. W. B. Caldwell, in fifty years' family practise in Illinois.

No wonder mothers have such entire confidence in giving little ones Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin!

If you have a baby, you have constant need of this wonderful preparation of pure pepsin, active senna, and fresh herbs. A child who gets this gentle stimulant for the stomach, liver and bowels is always healthier. It keeps children's delicate systems from clogging. It will overcome the most stubborn condition of constipation. It builds them up, and is nothing like the strong cathartics that sap their strength and energy.

A coated tongue or bad breath is the signal for a spoonful of Syrup Pepsin. Children take it readily, for it is really delicious in flavor. Taste it! Take Syrup Pepsin yourself, when sluggish or bilious, or you are troubled with sick headaches and no appetite. Take some for several days when run-down, and see how it picks you up.

It is a prescription preparation which every drug store has ready; in big bottles, just ask anywhere for Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin.

The Black Box of Silence

SYNOPSIS

Owen Landis, young inventor, has developed an extraordinary "silencer," which is stolen from a safe in his laboratory. Landis tells Wally Markham, his chum, the only person, beside himself, knowing the combination of the safe, is Betty Lawson, with whom the inventor is in love. Markham takes a plaster cast of a woman's footprint, found beneath the window of the laboratory, and takes an opportunity to fit it to one of Betty's shoes. They are identical. Betty tells Markham Herbert Canby, a stranger, posing as a "promoter," had driven her home the previous night, and that she had dozed in the car. Markham does not tell Landis of his discovery. Vaguely suspicious of Canby's honesty, he searches his hotel room, in his absence, finding two loaded automatic revolvers and a complete set of burglars tool. Canby brings the revolvers and burglar's kit to the hotel clerk, claiming to have just found them in his room. That night the safe in the bank at Perthdale is blown open and looted, the noise of the explosion being unheard. Satisfied that his "black box" is in the hands of crooks, Landis, with Markham, goes to Perthdale. Three strangers, claiming to be business men of Louisville, are the only possible suspects. Markham and Landis decide to follow them, although advices from Louisville seems to guarantee the standing of the three. At St. Joseph Markham sees Canby's car. He learns Canby is driving west, with Betty Lawson and her father as his guests in the car. While he and Landis are sleeping, Markham's car is stolen and wrecked. He buys another, and they go on.

—7—

"No; but there was a perfectly good roadster wrecked back there in Kansas," Markham put in pointedly.

"Yes, but nothing in the wide world to connect the wrecking with these men we're chasing. Why would a trio of bank burglars, if that's what they are, pass up all the chances in six or seven hundred miles and go streaking off up here in these mountains?"

"Just so," said Markham with a short laugh. "It isn't decent. But there is something else I'd like to know. What has become of Canby and the Lawsons?"

This question was answered late in the afternoon, as they were running down the valley of the Panniken toward Copah—still gaining upon the Fleetwing, as they learned by inquiry as they had come along. It was at a water tank station on the Pacific Southwestern that they first heard of the Nordyke limousine. It was ahead of them; had apparently been ahead all day. They had stopped at a filling station to get gas, and to ask about the Fleetwing, and the gas man grinned.

"You'll have to step on it some to catch up with them fellers in the Eight," he told them. "They pulled up here coupla hours ago and told me they'd made it from Denver since mornin'." Then, "What's the matter with that bunch? Ever'body seems to be askin' about 'em."

"Who else, besides us?" Markham wanted to know.

"Three folks in a Nordyke limousine; right handsome young feller drivin' and doin' the talkin', with a girl pretty enough to wake the dead settin' in with him, and an oldish man in the back."

"About how long ago was this?"

"I disremember; about an hour, I reckon."

Markham was putting the gears in low for the start when Landis halted him to ask another question of the gas man.

"Did the limousine driver ask about anybody else?"

The man scratched his head as if trying to remember. Suddenly he looked up with the wide-mouthed grin again in place. "Why, yes—come to think. Wanted to know if anybody else had been along askin' about the Eight; two fellers, he said, but he couldn't tell me what kind of a car they'd be drivin'."

It was Landis who spoke first when the two were once more on their way.

"Wally, how is Bert Canby mixed up in this thing?" he demanded. "What is his connection with these fellows? And why is he keeping tab on us?"

"Why ask me?" Markham shirked.

"Because I've had a feeling all along that you know more about this mystery than I do; more than you are willing to tell me."

"If you put it on the ground of knowledge, I don't, Owen; I'm just as much befuddled as you are. I can say that honestly."

"You are trying to shield somebody, Wally. Who is it?"

"Wait," said Markham shortly; then, "As I say, I'm just as much in the dark as you are. But, take the known facts in their order. On the night when you show me what your black box can do, you lose it, and the circumstantial evidence indicates that a man and a woman raided your shop. Next we hear of a bank wrecking that made no noise; then we get on the trail of these three men from Louisville and run into two more of the no-noise wreckings. Farther along, we discover that Canby is following us, or the Louisville bunch or both. Next we—"

"You needn't catalogue the twists and turns. If you know anything more than you've told me, you ought to turn it loose, Wally."

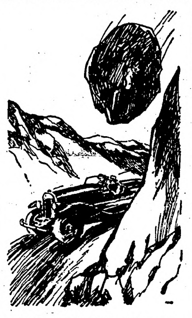
"I don't know anything—more's the pity; and that's the stubborn truth. But I'm going to know, before we quit and call it a day."

By this time the road had left the narrow valley of the Pannikin. Knowing from the itinerary in the route book that there were hazards ahead on the descent to the Red desert edge mining town of Copah, and hoping to be able to have daylight for the negotiating of them, Markham did not spare the car on the way up. Nevertheless, it was coming on dusk when they found themselves entering upon the hazardous descent, with the lights of Copah winking in the distance.

It was while they were sliding silently down the steep grades that they passed a large closed car stopped midway on one of the tangents, as if its occupants had halted to view the sunset glories.

"Sightseers," said Markham; and then, suddenly, "Say, Owen; wasn't that the Nordyke—Canby's car?"

What Landis might have answered was lost in the limbo of things unsaid. As they rounded a "hairpin" curve and shot away down the succeeding tangent they could see the stopped car high above standing behind a row of great stones set up by the road builders to guard the down-mountain side of the highway. All at once one of the huge guard rocks heaved itself from its place to come tumbling over and down the declivity, timed as if by some calculating agency to reach the lower tangent coincidentally with the racing roadster.



It Was All Over in a Moment

Fortunately, Markham was one of those drivers whose reactions in an emergency are so instantaneous as to seem purely automatic. He did the only thing there was to do—released the brakes and jammed the foot throttle open to its limit.

It was all over in a moment. With only a fraction of a second to spare at the point of intersection, but that fraction on the side of safety, the flying car shot fairly under the hurtling menace and went racing on to the next doubling curve.

It was not until the car shot out upon the valley level that Landis relaxed, drawing a long breath and saying, "I'm handing it to you, Wally. You've a lot better nerve than I have. I should have tried to stop if I'd been at the wheel. How do you suppose it happened?"

"One guess is as good as another. Mine is that whoever was driving that stopped car had cramped his front wheel against the rock for safety. Natural thing to do on such a stiff grade."

Silence for a speeding mile, and then Landis fairly shouted.

"Say, Wally! We've been asleep at the switch—both of us! Think back a minute; didn't you notice that the rock didn't make any noise coming down?"

"What's that?" snapped Markham, braking the car to an abrupt stop. Then, "I knew there was something queer about the thing, but I was too busy just then to figure out what it was. But you've put your finger on it. That tumbling rock ought to have made racket enough to wake the dead—and there wasn't a sound!"

"Well, you know there is only one way to account for that, don't you?"

"You bet your life I do! That stopped car had your infernal machine in it—that's what. We're in luck at last." And he began to back the car for a turn.

"Hold on," Landis broke in. "What are you going to do?"

"Go back up the hill and have it out with that bunch, whoever they are!"

"Listen to reason a minute, Wally." Landis said quietly. "If they are the men we've been trying for three days to run down, how much chance would we have in a road scrap with a carload of yeggs most likely armed to the teeth? Besides, we haven't lost 'em. They can't go on to wherever they're going without passing us, and when they come along we can swing in and sit on their tail, can't we?"

"Ump! You're too d—d sensible for any use!" Markham grunted. "It gets me on the raw. I'm not used to being [illegible] for a bunch of murderers to throw stones at. Just before the thing came off I was asking you if the car wasn't a Nordyke. Was it? Or was it the Fleetwing?"

"I couldn't say. All I noticed was that it was a closed car."

"No matter; we'll find out in a few minutes what it was—or is."

They were entering Copah. Markham steered into the shadows and turned off the car lights.

They had not long to wait before the headlights of a following car appeared on the rearward road. "Spot it as it passes!" Markham rapped out; and so they did, both of them. What they saw was a mere thickening of the mysteries. For the passing car, slowing to town speed as it entered the town street, was no other than Canby's limousine, with Canby himself at the wheel.

"If I wasn't reasonably certain that we're both fairly sane and in our right minds—" Markham began. Then, "You saw them, didn't you?"

"I saw Canby, yes."

"But he wasn't alone."

"No; there were two people in the back seat."

"Exactly. Betty and her father, of course."

"I suppose so; though I couldn't make them out very well."

"But, see here; Canby was an hour ahead of us at the last place we inquired, which was only a few miles back. His car couldn't have been the one we saw stopped up there on the mountain grade."

"Of course not. The people who were in that car pushed a rock over on us. Besides, Canby hasn't my black box."

"D—n!" gritted Markham impatiently; and then, "Owen, this thing is getting too many twists and tangles in it—altogether too many. I can't understand how Canby got behind us."

Landis shook his head. "Let's wait a bit and see if another car doesn't turn up," he suggested. "There must be another one, you know."

They waited for half an hour or more and nothing turned up. "It's no use," Markham said at last. "We may as well drive on and get something to eat."

They had eaten dinner in the dining room without seeing anybody they recognized, and were making inquiries at the desk for the Canby-Lawson party.

"Nobody of either name this evening," said the clerk, "but that doesn't necessarily spell anything. If they are merely motoring through, they may have taken dinner tickets at the cashier's window; in which case we'd have no record."

"I see," said Markham. Then he took from his pocketbook the slip upon which, in the St. Joseph hotel, he had copied the names of the three Louisville men, and handed it to the clerk. "Any of these gentlemen here?"

"Why, yes; all three of them. They came in this afternoon. There they are now—" pointing across the lobby.

"Thanks," said Markham, and the two crossed to the neighborhood of the three, Markham saying, "They don't know us, so we can take a good look at them, for whatever that may amount to," and accordingly they took a couple of chairs a short distance from the three where they could sit and smoke and observe.

For a time the espial went for nothing. One of the trio was reading a newspaper, and the others, the tall man and the sandy-haired one—the one who had bought the new Fleetwing in Chillicothe—were smoking. There was nothing suspicious in the appearance or actions of any of them.

"Well?" said Landis, "Where do we go from here?"

"I'm waiting for Canby to show up," was the low-toned reply. "I'd like to find out how he is linked up with these people."

"In that case won't it be better if we don't let him see us first?"

"You're right; we'll take the mezzanine. We can look on as well from there."

They had scarcely settled themselves when a surprised voice behind them said, "Well—of all things! You two out here?"

"Betty!" Landis exclaimed, springing to his feet.

Markham laughed and said, "Sure; and why not?"

"But you never said a word to me, either of you, before we left Carthage! How did you come—by train?"

"Part of the way," Markham qualified. "But again I ask, why not? Why shouldn't we take a few days off and—"

"I know; but it's perfectly wonderful that we should meet here this way."

Markham drew up a chair for her. "Sit down and we'll unravel it. Owen was needing a rest and a change of scene, so I took him by the neck and ran off with him. Where is your father? And how do you come to be breaking your journey in Copah?"

"Daddy is around, somewhere; and we're not breaking our journey. We're leaving presently—going on to see the Red desert by moonlight."

"Oh; so you're driving?"

"Yes; with Bert, in his stuffy luxury car. At the last minute after we'd all bought our train tickets—Bert was going along, you know—he said he'd like to drive, if we would. So we took our tickets back and came in the car."

"Had a good trip this far?"

"Glorious."

"When did you reach Copah?"

"Oh, quite a little while ago; about five o'clock, I think it was. Anyhow, daddy and I had time to bathe and change and get to the solarium in time to see the sunset over the Red desert. It was simply gorgeous!"

"But you took a drive after that, didn't you?" Landis put in.

Eastern Railroad Just Succession of Curves

One of the longest crooked railroads in the United States is the New York, Ontario & Western, which runs up through the central part of New York state and over into the anthracite coal regions of Pennsylvania. It is believed that the road has not a single stretch of its entire length which extends straightway for as much as a mile. Much of the main line extends through crooked alleys, curving along between parallel ranges of mountains. In some places the rear coaches of long passenger trains can be seen from the front as the train makes its sinuous way along.

Young's gap, the highest point on the main line, is reached by so steep a grade that coal trains require two engines to pull and a third to push to get up over the hump.—Washington Star.

Electrical Wood Tester

The "electric eye," a robot which is helping man to solve problems of traffic, science and industry, has now been joined by "electric fingers." This apparatus works magic for the lumber dealer who wishes to know whether his wood is well seasoned. Inserted a fraction of an inch into a board, the electric fingers will announce on a dial the moisture content of the wood; the process takes only a few seconds, whereas older methods require a week to obtain the same information. The new instrument was developed by Dr. C. G. Suits of the General Electric research laboratory, and M. E. Dunlap of the United States forest products laboratory at Madison, Wis.

Cookies for Ever-Hungry Youngsters

Home-made Goodies Delight Kiddies

SCHOOL days again And hungry youngsters racing home and asking for "something good" to eat. If the cookie jar is kept well filled, mother will have no difficulty in satisfying the children, because these little cakes are substantial enough to satisfy the between-meal craving and still so light they will not spoil the appetite for regular meals.

While even plain cookies will appeal to nearly all children, try giving them something with a flavor they like. Cut the cookies in interesting shapes, such as stars, diamonds, and little animals! Or decorate the tops of plain cookies with some nuts, raisins, or small colored candies, and listen to the shouts of delight.

Add these to the school lunch, too, and watch the interest of the youngsters in that rather difficult meal.

Chocolate Cookies

2¼ cups sifted cake flour
½ teaspoon cinnamon
1¼ teaspoons baking powder
⅛ teaspoon soda
¼ cup butter or other shortening
1 cup sugar
2 eggs, well beaten
3 squares unsweetened chocolate, melted
1 tablespoon cream

Sift flour once, measure, add cinnamon, baking powder, and soda, and sift together three times. Cream butter thoroughly, add sugar gradually, and cream together until light and fluffy. Add eggs, chocolate, and cream, and beat well. Add flour, a small amount at a time. Beat after each addition until smooth. Chill until firm enough to roll. Roll into thin sheet on slightly floured board. Cut with floured cooky cutters as desired. Dredge with sugar, or decorate with nuts, shredded coconut, small colored candies, colored sugars, or dried fruits (raisins, currants, and thin slices citron). Place on ungreased baking sheet and bake in moderate oven (350° F.) 9 minutes. Makes 2½ dozen large cookies.

Chocolate Drop Cookies

2 cups sifted cake flour
½ teaspoon soda
dash of salt
½ cup butter or other shortening
⅔ cup brown sugar, firmly packed
1 egg, well beaten
3 squares unsweetened chocolate, melted
½ cup milk
1 teaspoon vanilla
½ cup walnut meats, broken

Sift flour once, measure, add soda and salt, and sift together twice. Cream butter thoroughly, add sugar gradually, and cream together until light and fluffy. Add egg and beat well. Add chocolate and blend. Add flour, alternately with milk, a small amount at a time. Beat after each addition until smooth. Add vanilla and nuts. Drop from teaspoon on greased baking sheet and bake in moderate oven (350° F.) about 7 minutes. Frost with chocolate butter frosting if desired. Makes 50 cookies.

OBSERVATION OF GAME LAWS ADDS TO FUR INCOME

E. J. Condon pointing out to Miss Betty Sheridan the flaws in a fur which has been improperly stretched and dried.

That more careful observation of the game laws in any given section will result in increased income to the trappers is the basis of a recent statement made by the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. Most of the game laws not only protect wild life during the natural breeding season thereby assuring a supply of pelts for succeeding years, but further operate to the best interests of the trapper by prohibiting the wasteful taking of pelts at a time when fur quality is at a low point.

Furs taken from animals during the "unprime" season have a mangy, flat, lusterless appearance and are unfit for making first-class garments. In winter, those same animals will grow new underfur in preparation for the cold weather and their outer guard hair will take on its finest sheen. Naturally the market price will be greatly increased.

"Proper preparation of pelts," declares E. J. Condon, director of the Foundation, "is another very important factor in the fur income. Pelts which have been carefully removed in the approved fashion and properly stretched and dried are always in demand and bring decidedly higher returns which much more than justify the slightly increased effort. It is the purpose of the First National Fur Show which will take place at Chicago the last two weeks in April to drive home the lesson of trapping within the legal season, and then to further extend the idea of properly skinning and packing the pelts, in order that trappers may receive the fullest possible profit from the sale of the furs they catch."

Repeal Proposal Defeated

A bold and unprecedented attempt by the Democratic leadership to force its party's outright prohibition repeal proposal thru the house failed Monday and dimmed prospects of further action on the issue in that branch during the remainder of the short session.

The action was interpreted on Capitol hill as foreshadowing a special sesion of the new congress next spring soon after President-elect Roosevelt is inaugurated so that the Democrats may carry out their pledge for flat repeal.

Despite the defeat of the resolution by the narrow margin of 272 to 144—two-thirds majority being required for adoption—the Democrats planned immediate attack on the program of modifying the Volstead law.

Speaker Garner hopes a beer bill will be ready for action before the Christmas holidays.

Funeral Services Held

Funeral services were conducted at Neilsville, Minnesota, on Wednesday, Nov. 30th for Mrs. Elmer Odie of Mud Lake who died in a hospital at Thief River Falls on Wednesday, Nov. 23. She was born April 25, 1890 at Neilsville, and at the time of her death was 42 years old. She leaves to mourn her death her husband and two children, at their home in Mud Lake.

Congregation Held Meeting

The congregation of the Nazareth Lutheran Church held their annual meeting at the church here on Monday evening, Nov. 28. Only a few members of the congregation were present.

Reports of the secretary and treasurer were read and approved. New officers were also elected to serve for the coming year and are as follows: President of the Church Council, Rev. L. M. Redal; Vice-President, H. T. Larson; Secretary, Gilbert Sanoden; Treasurer, C. L. Sandberg; Trustee for three years, F. K. Fredrickson; Deacons, A. B. Anderson and Olaf Halvorson. The two other trustees who held over are O. H. Nohre and Guy Anderson.

The Nazareth Ladies Aid met the same evening and held their annual meeting with a very small attendance. Reports of their secretary and treasurer were read and approved. The following officers were elected to have charge of the organization for the coming year: President, Mrs. O. H. Nohre; Vice-President, Mrs. L. M. Redal; Secretary, Mrs. Olaf Halvoson; Treasurer, Mrs. Guy Anderson.

A free lunch was served and a social hour was spent after the meeting.

Mr. Nybakken, Mr. Sather, Miss Anderson, Miss Lanman, Miss Johnson and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph G. Nelson were dinner guests at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Sam Lorentson on Tuesday evening.

Direct to Farmer Loan

A new farm credit set-up which brings money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation directly to the farmer at seven percent on all kinds of livestock without any other charges, has been completed by the government, thus making this money available to the farmer as well as to the banker and railroad, altho at a somewhat higher rate of interest.

The money is handled thru Regional Agricultural Credit Corporations, with one located in each Federal Reserve District. Two types of loans are granted: barn yard loans, which are on stock normally carried on the farm; and feeder loans, for those who buy cattle to fatten. Loans can be made for seventy percent of the value of the livestock, including horses as well as cattle.

Instead of handling the loans thru established loan agencies as in the past, the farmer now deals directly with the governmental agency, and is given the blanks to fill out in applying for the loan.

SCHOOL NOTES

HIGH SCHOOL

In English III we are starting our American Literature course.

In Public Speaking we had been studying the different kinds of breathing and Miss Anderson asked Stilof the following question: "Stilof, describe clavicular breathing."

To which Stilof replied, "Breath comes in 'short pants'."

Grades I and II

The following children are on the Honor Roll this six week period:

Grade I—Luella Fluke.

Grade II — Ruby Halvorson, Roy Johnson, Ruth Halvorson.

The second grade are enjoying new seat work booklets. So far Roy Johnson has had 100 on every sheet in his booklet.

The following children had 100 in Spelling on Friday: Irene, Wayne, Lillian, Elaine, Ruth, Harriet, Junieve, and Ruby.

Grades III, IV and V

The following children had 100 in Spelling last Friday:

Third — Lois Hanson, Ruby Werner, Morris Bottem.

Fourth—Lorene Fluke.

Fifth — Lila Kolden, Palma Johnson, Vernice Tollefsrud, Myrtle Ness.

Grades VI, VII and VIII

On Friday afternoon we had our Colonial party. The program was given by the seventh graders, who dramatized four original plays from colonial life.

Lowell had the best paper in this week's 7th grade Arithmetic Self Testing Drill.

The 8th grade reading class is studying Dickens' "A Christmas Carol."

The American Red Cross dished out a ton and a quarter of flour to needy families here on Saturday. Only those whom do not have jobs and otherwise no way to pay for any were given flour. Fricker and Hanson took charge of the distribution here.

The Carlson Mercantile company have decorated their store all up for Christmas and are inviting the people of this community to come in and shop, while their shelves are full of practical gifts for every member of the family.

Village Election Held

The annual village election was held on Tuesday and it did not create much of a stir in our local politics. Only 28 votes were cast. The only changes made in the village officers were that Sovde went in as councilman for three years, taking the place of Lorentson and Lorentson took the place of Backlund as assessor for two years.

The following candidates were nominated at the caucus meeting on Saturday evening and, were elected on Tuesday:

For President of Village Council
H. O. Hanson
For Village Clerk 2 Years
Geo. Fricker
For Village Treasurer 1 Year
A. L. Carlson
For Councilman 3 Years
O. E. Sovde
For Assessor 2 Years

Elsberg Appointed Highway Commissioner

N. W. Elsberg, for 11 years Minneapolis city engineer, was appointed state highway commissioner on Tuesday to succeed Charles M. Babcock, who was removed three days ago by Governor Floyd B. Olson.

The appointment is effeetive January 1, when Mr. Babcock's forced resignation becomes effective.

Mr. Elsberg is expected to accept the appointment, in spite of a lower salary than he is now getting as city engineer. The opportunity in a new field and the prestige of a state job, together with the fact that the city engineer's post has been the center of much "grief" in recent years, are expected to be factors in his decision. Elsberg and the Governor had a conference on Tuesday.

It is expected there will be some changes in personnel in the highway department as a result. Mr. Elsberg undoubtedly will retain part of the present staff at least until he becomes fully acquainted with the work, but it is likely some employees will go.

Budget Set for Next 2 Years

A state budget for the next two years of $33,000,000 was proposed last week by State Budget Commissioner Jean W. Wittich. Her recommendations to the governor and legislature call for a total state expenditure which is less than $40,000,000 for the first time since 1921.

Releasing her estimate of the total appropriations to be asked of the legislature, Mrs. Wittich said she proposes a reduction of $6,000,000 under the sum appropriated two years ago. She accompanied her recommendation with the suggestion that there be no further appropriations financed by certificates of indebtedness or bond issues, a favorite scheme in recent years.

Mrs. Wittich, in announcing what she would recommend in the way of appropriations, did not make known what she proposes to give each department or institution, but said merely the total recommended will be about $38,000,000. There are still some departments to be reviewed, she said.

It is requested that all band members attend rehearsal in the schoolhouse Tuesday night, December 13. An important discussion will be held after practice. Band Member, be there!

T. B. Takes Toll in County

Seven Marshall county residents died of tuberculosis last year, according to a report from the Minnesota Public Health Association, in connection with the Christmas Seal sale to raise funds to fight this preventable and curable desease.

Two died in Pennington county one in Ottertail and one in Polk.

"Records of the tuberculosis deaths throughout Minnesota show that 1,064 men, women and children were victims in 1931" the report states. "Every 24 hours, tuberculosis claimed three Minnesota citizens.

"Tuberculosis booms in times of want, crowded living and worry. Thirteen of the largest cities in the United States showed an increase in 1931. This is said to be one of the first widespread evidences of the effects of the depression on health. It is a warning of danger.

"The need for the Christmas Seal campaign to find and prevent tuberculosis is greater now than ever before in order to hold the gains we have made.

Oen Elected Football Captain

Roy Oen, son of Rasmus Oen of Thief River Falls, was elected captain of the University of Minnesota football team for 1933 by unanimous choice of his mates on Monday of last week.

Minneapolis sport writers were all pleased with the selection, and considered it a well merited reward.

NOTICE!

All business places in Holt will be closed on Monday, Dec. 26 and also on Monday, January 2. This is done because of the fact that Christmas Day and New Years Day come on Sunday.

Please bear in mind that the Creamery will also be closed and that cream will be taken in on Tuesday those two weeks.

Ten Years Through Ups and Downs

It is said what goes up must come down.

This is what happened to prices. Now that prices are down there is only one place they can go and that is up. Now is the time to have a little faith in the future and take advantage of the increases as they come along.

Through all of these ups and downs this bank has continued to serve this community. It has been tested beyond all limits and it is here to serve the people in the same old way.

The bank deeply appreciates the confidence of the people that have made it possible to weather all of these storms.

32 Graves Registered

Of approximately 30,000 graves of veterans of past wars estimated in Minnesota, a total of 18,398 bave been registered in the state adjutant general's office thru the efforts of American Legion and auxilliary units, it was announced recently in the Minnesota Legionnaire. A tabalation was published showing that thirty-two graves are now registered in Marshall county; six in Pennington, six in Red Lake, twelve in Clearwater and fourteen in Roseau. The work of registration was started five years ago following action by the state legislature.

OLD WOMEN VICTIMS OF MEANEST SLAYER

Spreads Terror Through the West Side of Manhattan.

New York.—New York's "meanest murderer" is spreading terror through the West side of Manhattan, while some 10,000 policemen and detectives glorifying in the title of "the finest" wrack their brains and exhaust their energies in a vain search for him.

The "meanest murderer" specializes in the killing of helpless old women living alone. He pounces upon them, generally when they are asleep, and smothers or strangles them to death without giving them a chance to make an outcry. Four of them have gone to their rewards at his cowardly hands in this fashion in the last few weeks, all within a radius of a dozen blocks or so, and so stealthily has the slayer gone about his work and so skillfully has he covered up his tracks that the police are yet without the slightest clew to his identity, or whereabouts. Indeed some of the best detectives of the force have suggested in view of the character of the crimes and in lieu of any definite evidence that the killer might be a woman.

Motive Uncertain.

Moreover the "best minds" of the department have so far been unable to determine for a certainty just what motive may actuate the strange killings. In some cases, evidence has been found to warrant a theory of robbery, but since none of the victims enjoyed a station in life which might be dignified even by the title of "well to do" and since in at least two instances, the victims' hoards of a few coins were left untouched, the suggestion seems somehow lacking.

Some investigators express the opinion that the fugitive is a maniac, but just why he should limit his operations to elderly women no one can guess.

Whether one or many, however, the "meanest murderer" still stalks his way unmolested—unless his fate has overtaken him unknown to the police—while old women quake in terror and refuse to be left alone.

The latest victim of the series was Mrs. Mary Day, seventy years old, who was found smothered in bed in her little flat on the second floor of a building in West Fifty-third street.

A small bottle of milk and a copy of the Irish World still untouched in front of her door brought about the discovery of the murder.

Sometime between 7 and 9 a. m., according to the police and Dr. Charles Norris, chief medical examiner, some one came into the three room flat, threw a shawl and a blanket over the head of the victim, held it tight until she ceased to struggle, and then tied her frail arms behind her with bandages Mrs. Day had received recently from a hospital.

Whether it was a man or woman or more than one person the twenty detectives reporting at the scene were unable to say. Mrs. Day was so frail it was believed that even a woman might have killed her without arousing the neighbors.

Neighbor Finds Body.

For five years Mrs. Day had lived alone in the tenement house, supported apparently by a savings account in the New York Savings bank, of which there is still $3,254 left. She had no known relatives, and during the years she lived in the building Mrs. Day always left her door open during the day, a sign that neighbors were welcome.

The copy of the Irish World and the bottle of milk drew the attention of Mrs. Julia Benedetti shortly after 1 p. m. She had not seen the aged woman since the morning before. Mrs. Benedetti told Bernard Murray, son of the janitress and he found the body and notified the police.

Nothing had been disturbed when the police arrived. The body lay on a bed in the room which acted as her living room and kitchen. Only an open bureau drawer showed that robbery might have been the motive. A pocketbook containing a little more than $5 was on the floor beside her bed. While the police were mystified as to the cause of the murder they admitted that Mrs. Day had withdrawn a sum of money from her savings account some time ago and that possibly the slayer or members of the same gang responsible for the death of the three other aged women, might have followed her from the bank and learned where she kept the money at home.

Each of the other murders has taken place in much the same manner and in the same neighborhood, and each victim was an elderly woman living alone.

Army Prefers Bacon to Salt Pork Slabs

Washington.—The army has just moved to benefit both the soldier's palate and the farmer's pocketbook by decreeing for its troops the kind of bacon that curls and crisps instead of the familiar slabs of salt pork.

Regulations provide that the ration for each soldier must include six ounces of bacon. For years a part of the daily fare has been dry salt pork, generally cooked with its equally well-known comrade-at-arms, beans.

Recent revision of the regulations permits substitution of sugar-cured bacon, and the quartermaster corps is laying in a large supply. Troops stationed abroad will continue to get salt pork, however, as it is particularly adapted for shipment into warm climates.

Muskrats Fail Indian Prophet on Bad Winter

Lac du Flambeau, Wis.—Old Sarinesco, venerable brave on the Flambeau reservation, retains his prestige as a weather prognosticator despite his miscalculations of last year.

One of the surest signs of a hard winter, Sarinesco says, can be found in the autumnal activities of the muskrats.

Last year he based his prediction of a cold winter with much snow on the size of the muskrat houses.

"Bad winter coming," he said. "Muskrat houses big, heap big, this year. Sure sign of bad winter. Rats know when cold winter coming and build big houses."

There are other signs, however, that enter into Sarinesco's calculations.

Moss on north side of trees very thick," he said last year. "That's a sure sign. Husk on maize very thick, too. And hair on ponies very thick. We have big winter with lots of snow."

Sarinesco's "weather signs" failed him in this region last year, for the winter was unusually mild.

Deaf-Blind Persons Are Most Neglected of All

Survey Finds 887 So Afflicted in United States.

New York.—Five years' reasearch has located 887 persons in the United States, and 57 in Canada, who are both deaf and blind, it is disclosed in a report to the American Braille Press here.

The report summarizes the findings and conclusions of an exhaustive survey of deaf-blindness conducted by Mrs. Corrinne Rocheleau Rouleau, of Washington, D. C., and Miss Rebecca Mack, of Cincinnati, Ohio. Mrs. Rouleau, author of the report, has been deaf since childhood, but has perfect sight; Miss Mack has been partially blind since childhood, but has perfect hearing.

"As a class, the deaf-blind in our midst are not only the most heavily handicapped and the most lonely of all human beings, but also, as a class, the most neglected," declares Mrs. Rouleau. "We even know of deaf-blind children who have been placed in asylums for the feeble-minded without proper trial—the so-called intelligence tests being quite worthless in evaluating their potentialities.

"How often have we learned of deaf-blind children or adolescents being refused entrance in schools for the deaf because they are blind, or in schools for the blind because they are deaf; or because schools have no trained teachers available; or because they fear that such pupils will prove too difficult, expensive and burdensome.

"We have the names and addresses of 944 deaf-blind persons living in the United States and Canada, and much assorted information about them.

"Of our cases, most are white persons, although a number of negroes also figure, and one Indian; there are men, women and children of all ages. Many of them are maimed as well as deaf and blind. A small handful are war veterans. In addition to braille, the deaf-blind have various other methods of communication, such as the sign language, the Morse code, etc. In most of our listed cases, the persons have retained or acquired the faculty of speech, of the spoken word."

Some efforts to register, educate, and care for the deaf-blind are now being made in London, Paris, Berlin, and Montreal, according to Mrs. Rouleau, who adds: "We hope that all these things and more will be done for our American cases through the well-directed efforts of a central committee for the deaf-blind."

Such a joint committee was started last year, with Mrs. Rouleau as chairman, by the Volta bureau, the American Federation of Associations for the Hard of Hearing, and the American Foundation for the Blind.

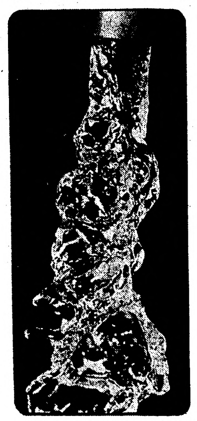
Harvard Has Monopoly on the Word "Detur"

Boston.—Award of 55 deturs to Harvard students, the largest number since this practice was inaugurated here 220 years ago, was announced by the university.

The word "detur" is defined in the New Standard Dictionary as "a book, or set of books, given as a prize to each meritorious undergraduate student in Harvard university; from the Latin word 'detur' (Let it be given) on the presentation bookplate." As far as is known, the word never has been adopted at any other university.

Deturs date back to the death of Edward Hopkins, a Seventeenth century London merchant, who left a fund "to give some encouragement in those foreign plantations for the breeding up of hopeful youths."

CAMERA STOPS WATER



Water from the faucet stopped to pose for its portrait when this unusual photograph was made at an exposure of 1-50,000 of a second. The constantly changing pattern of flowing water, which ordinarily appears to the eye as a blurred vision, is now revealed in strange forms not unlike icicles or molten glass. The photograph was made by means of a new electrical circuit developed at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology by Prof. Harold L. Edgerton and Kenneth J. Germeshausen

TALES OF THE CHIEFS

By Editha L. Watson

POPE

A man may rise to power, but if he is not able to keep it from going to his own head, his fall will be greater than his rise.

The Pueblos had never taken kindly to Spanish rule. Misunderstandings, prejudice, and ignorance had widened the breach from both sides. The Indians were discontented: they grumbled and plotted.

It remained for a San Juan medicine man, living at Taos, to precipitate events. Pope had given the matter much study, and he gradually evolved a way to unite the Pueblos in rebellion. This was done slowly. Haste did not seem to bring results for the Indians.

Pope began to preach the independence of the Indians. Why should they bow to the white men? They were many more in number, and if they would act at a given time, they could quietly kill every foreigner in the land, and go back to their own ways; and no one would be the wiser.

The idea took root among the Pueblos. One bold stroke, and the trouble would be over, they thought. Even the far-off Hopis of Arizona were inflamed, and joined the plan with enthusiasm.

August 13, 1860, was to be the great day of Pueblo freedom. Runners were sent with knotted cords to show the date. The news spread to all the participating Pueblos (the Piros, for some reason, were not included), and suppressed excitement beat in every Indian heart.

Since a woman in love has neither conscience nor judgment, and lest some Indian maid might love and talk to a white man, no women were admitted to the plot. Every possible precaution was taken. Pope even put his own brother-in-law to death, because he was not sure of him.

Yet somehow the plot became known, and the only thing to do was to strike at once, before the Spaniards could prepare counter-plans. Six days before the selected date, then, the concerted uprising took place.

There were 33 missionaries in the Pueblo country. Twenty-one of these were killed, and about 375 other colonists, nearly a sixth of the total number. The missions were torn down. Furnishing which had been brought many weary miles—some, even, from Spain—were destroyed. The records of the churches were burned.

Governor Otermin, at Santa Fe, gathered the remaining Spaniards into the government buildings. These were strongly built, and although 3,000 Indians besieged them for ten days, the walls held, and a desperate sortie finally forced the Pueblos back, with considerable loss. Then, on August 21, about 1,000 Spaniards began the long retreat down the Rio Grande to El Paso, and left the country to the Pueblos, from whom they had taken it. It remained Indian territory for 12 years.

Pope was now at the height of his glory. Richly dressed in the finest ceremonial garments, he made a triumphal journey through the Pueblos, and was hailed as a savior of his people. The Indians returned to their ancient ways. Those who had been baptized took a ceremonial cleansing bath in yucca suds; every destroyable thing left behind met its fate, and the Spanish language and even Spanish names were forbidden. All this was Pope's order, and the Indians, delighted at the success of their rebellion, hastened to obey their brilliant leader.

But Pope had been given too much power, and he was not strong enough to handle it. He became a despot; those who did not obey every whim were put to death. He demanded all the most beautiful women as his right. From being the deliverer of his people, he became their burden.

Then drought came on the Pueblos—that ancient enemy of the southwestern people. The crops shriveled in the sun, and famine waited, grinning, only a little way off. The Apaches and the Utes, who had been afraid of the Spaniards, now felt that there was nothing to fear, and resumed their raids. Civil war, also, broke out, and the Pueblos divided and fought each other. What a dreary, sorrowful freedom they had won!

And Pope was the cause of it all, they thought. "Those Above" were angry at him, and at them for obeying him, and had sent drought, and enemies without and within, as punishment. Pope had become a sort of king, unreasonable, petulant, altogether intolerable. He could not help them in this trouble. They deposed him.

A new ruler for the Tewa and Tanos was elected, and he tried as well as he could to bring order out of Pope's chaos. In 1688, however, Pope tried a come-back. He reminded his people of their deliverance, and of who had planned it. He wanted to try again, and they gave him the chance.

But Pope's power and glory were departed. He had sat upon the throne of all the Pueblos; he was now an elected ruler of two of them. The great authority had been taken from him, and he was little better than any tribal chief.

One thing alone was left him: he died before Diego de Vargas reconquered the Pueblo country in 1692, and he never knew but that his country was eternally free.

POULTRY

ALWAYS CAUSE FOR HENS NOT LAYING

Management Means Increase of Egg Production.

By H. H. ALP, Poultry Extension Specialist, College of Agriculture, University of Illinois.—WNU Service.

There are many reasons why hens don't lay, but one thing is certain. More attention could be given to better management on many farms where egg production is low. Probably the most common reason for unthrifty birds that lay poorly in the fall is worms. In case of infested flocks it would be advisable to treat the birds and then confine them to clean quarters to prevent a reinfestation. Prevention of intestinal worms in chickens is covered in the college's circular No. 344, which makes reference to the use of common lye for this purpose.

Hens won't lay their best unless their houses are kept clean, free from lice and mites, well ventilated and not overcrowded. Four square feet a bird is best for good results. There also should be plenty of feed hopper space. Hoppers ten feet long which permit feeding from both sides will provide enough hopper space for 100 birds. Plenty of fresh drinking water also is important.

It should be an easy matter to get a good feed mixture or ration that will produce eggs. A number of suitable mash mixtures which, for the most part, can be made from home-grown grains are given in the college's circular No. 275 on feeding for egg production. One of many mash mixtures that may be used can be made from 200 pounds ground yellow corn, 100 pounds ground wheat, 100 pounds ground oats, 50 pounds meat scrap, 25 pounds dried milk, 25 pounds soybean oil meal, 2½ pounds steamed bone meal, 2½ pounds ground limestone and 5 pounds salt.

Leghorn Held Champion Pullet of All Breeds

According to the officials of the Record of Performance association in New York state, the pullet bred by Otto Ruehle of Pleasant Valley, Dutchess county, completed the 355 egg record on October 1. The record began a few days after she returned from the 1931 New York state fair at Syracuse, where Prof. L. M. Hurd of the state college placed her as the grand champion pullet of all breeds. Professor Hurd describes the pullet, D-4318, as having ideal conformation for a white leghorn and plenty of constitution and vigor in her five pounds, to be a good layer.

D-4318 is the result of 25 years of breeding. Her mother laid eggs that weighed 32 ounces to the dozen and she has 63 sisters and half sisters that average more than 240 eggs in a year. In the first 140 days of the test the pullet laid an egg every day.

Start Chicks Carefully

In order to get baby chicks started in right it is essential that they be kept at a proper temperature. Too much heat tends to dry the chicks out and cause heavy loss. Overheating is just as dangerous as chilling in causing trouble.

Chicks should not be overheated in the incubator, and when they are moved to the brooder the temperature should be kept from 90 degrees to 95 degrees F. A good poultryman can gauge the temperature by the action of the chicks.

An important thing is to get chicks started on the right kind of ration, states J. H. Bodwell, commercial poultryman, who suggests some form of liquid milk or a starter that contains skimmilk or buttermilk. Do not feed grit for the first few weeks.—Prairie Farmer.

Few Really Large Flocks

Of the 379,000,000 of mature chickens on farms in the United States, 329,000,000 are kept in flocks of less than 400 birds. In Ohio, of the 200,000 farmers who keep chickens almost 183,000 own less than 200 birds. About 15,000 keep from 200 to 400 chickens. Only 2,700 farmers have more than 400 birds, and all but a few flocks contain less than 700 hens.

Poultry Notes

Hens have been known to lay two eggs in one day, but it is comparatively rare.

* * *

Where the birds are given white corn, they need the food properties found in legumes and other green stuff.

* * *

Lice or the de-pluming mite have been known to torment birds so that they have died from pain and exhaustion.

* * *

Cabbage is probably the best green food for pullets starting the winter laying season.

* * *

Eggs which are not naturally clean are inferior and buyers are unwilling to pay as much for them as they will for clean eggs.

* * *

In the heavy egg producer the pelvic bones are wide apart, thin, tapering and pliable. In the non-producer they are drawn close together and are usually covered with an accumulation of fat.

Words Are "Harder"

A Detroit newspaper man relates that his son, a schoolboy, confessed Saturday that he had failed in a spelling bee. "When I was a boy," said the father, "I was a good speller. What's the idea of your falling down in this spelling bee?" "Well, dad," said the lad, "we have harder words nowadays than they had when you were a boy." Further questioning brought out the fact that the boy had slipped up on the word "money," spelling it without the "e."

The Black Box of Silence

SYNOPSIS

Owen Landis, young inventor, has developed an extraordinary "silencer," which is stolen from a safe in his laboratory. Landis tells Wally Markham, his chum, the only person, beside himself, knowing the combination of the safe, is Betty Lawson, with whom the inventor is in love. Markham takes a plaster cast of a woman's footprint, found beneath the window of the laboratory, and takes an opportunity to fit it to one of Betty's shoes. They are identical. Betty tells Markham Herbert Canby, a stranger, posing as a "promoter," had driven her home the previous night, and that she had dozed in the car. Markham does not tell Landis of his discovery. The safe in the bank at Perthdale is blown open and looted, the noise of the explosion being unheard. Satisfied that his "black box" is in the hands of crooks, Landis, with Markham, goes to Perthdale. Three strangers, claiming to be business men of Louisville, are the only possible suspects. Markham and Landis decide to follow them, although advices from Louisville seems to guarantee the standing of the three. At St. Joseph Markham learns Canby is driving west, with Betty Lawson and her father as his guests in the car. While he and Landis are sleeping, Markham's car is stolen and wrecked. He buys another, and they go on. At a hotel in Copah they meet Betty. She is surprised at their presence in the West, and explains the reason for her and her father's journey.

—8—

"Daddy and I? Oh, no; we just rested until dinner time. But when did you two leave Carthage?"

Markham named the date, and she said, "Why, we must have been right along the road together! Or no; you said you came by train, didn't you?"

"I said, 'part of the way.' We got tired of the train, so I bought a car, and we came on in that."

"But where are you going?"

"Ask Owen; I'm merely his chauffeur."

Thus dragged in, Landis played up as best he could.

"I don't know—any more than the cat, Betty. We've just trundled along from one place to another, never knowing where the next stop would be."

"It must be simply spiffy to drift about that way, with no responsibilities."

"It is," Landis agreed. "I'm—er—having the time of my life."

"Yet you don't look it," asserted the frank one, fixing him with an appraisive eye. "You look haggard and worried. You ought to stop over in the Timanyoni and go fossil hunting with daddy."

Markham had been keeping an eye on the group of three below, and now he stood up and turned to face the balustrade. For Canby had joined the three, and was giving one of them a folded paper.

Markham excused himself and caught a descending elevator, and when Canby and the three moved away toward a side exit he was able to follow without being seen. The chase was a short one, ending at the hotel garage, which the four men entered together. Markham, slipping in upon the heels of the four, was able to conceal himself.

In a few minutes a handsome Fleetwing Eight came rolling velvet-footed to pause with its front wheels on the threshold of the entrance. As the car came to a stand Canby got out.

"As I've told you, you'll have to use your head," he was saying to the man at the wheel of the Eight. "The sketch-map layout I gave you is the best I could do. Your route book will show you where to turn off."

"No chance for a break on the date, is there?" came in low tones from the interior of the car.

"I don't make breaks," was the brittle retort. "You've got a monopoly in that field. Among you, you've balled things up beautifully!"

"The h—l you say!" growled the voice in the interior darkness. How could we know—?"

"It was your business to know! You had the whole thing in your hands three days ago; all you had to do was to sit down and wait until the flurry was over. And all you did was to yell for help! But that's a back number. Let it go and get out of here. And don't fall down on this business tonight. I'll meet you as arranged. Get a move!"

The big car rolled out across the sidewalk; and Canby walked quickly around to the side entrance of the hotel. Markham followed, but not directly. Beyond the hotel counter he found a hardware merchant just closing for the night, and persuaded the man to go back and sell him a couple of serviceable automatics. Then he returned to the hotel lobby, where he found Landis waiting for him.

"What did you find out?" Landis demanded.

"Enough to warrant us in getting quick action. Where is Betty?"

"She said it was leaving time for her and her father and went to get ready. Canby went up in an elevator."

"Did he see you?"

"No; I kept out of his sight. But no doubt he knows we are here."

"Naturally. Betty will tell him if he hasn't found out any other way."

"You say action; what is it to be?"

"A swift getaway. Get your dunnage and wait at the side entrance. I'll be there with the car inside of five minutes."

In rather less than five minutes Markham was placing the roadster at the side entrance to the hotel. Landis stowed the suitcases in the rumble and climbed to his place, saying, "Can't you tell me now?"

"Wait until we get out of town."

Landis waited, and he was still waiting when the roadster bumped over the final railroad crossing in the Red Buttle Western yards and shot out upon the broad, silent expanse of the Red desert.

CHAPTER VII

At the Cinnabar

"Something, but not as much as I hoped to," said Markham, in answer to Landis' repeated question as to what he had learned by following Canby and the three; and he recounted the talk he had overheard. "All I can make out of it is that Canby is hooked up with these men in some sort of a deal in which he is the kingpin."

"You say Canby gave the others a map?"

"Something of the sort. He called it 'the layout.'"

"What did he mean by saying that the three had yelled for help?"

"That is just another of the mysteries."

"You heard what Betty told us; that they had bought their train tickets, and then Canby changed his mind and asked them if they didn't want to drive? I'm wondering if it wasn't the yell for help that made him change his mind and plans."

"It may have been."

Landis spoke of something else. "You asked Betty what time they got into Copah, and her answer was, 'About five o'clock.' Also, she said she and her father watched the sunset from the mesa road; and not very long after that, Canby, with two people in his car, overtook us in the outskirts of town. How do you make that fit in?"

"I don't," said Markham shortly; "nothing fits in." Step by step, each new development, or half development, pointed to Canby as the thief of the black box of silence. But if Canby were the thief, Betty Lawson was just as certainly his accessory. And that, he told himself, was unbelievable. Yet there was the great stone, tumbling down the mountain side in utter silence, to point the finger of implication at Canby. What desperate undertaking was Canby engaged in that would warrant a cold-blooded double murder as one of its conditions?

The lights of Copah had long since vanished in the eastward distance before Markham spoke again.

"Sorry your time with Betty was cut so short, Owen. But maybe we'll see more of her later."

"The time was long enough," was the sober reply. And then, half hesitantly, "I'm out of it with Betty, Wally. Canby's the man."

"No, he isn't; not if our suspicions are justified."

Landis' smile was a mere baring of the teeth. "You ought to know women better than that, Wally. Business deals, straight or crooked, don't mean anything to a woman in love—"

"If you think Betty would wink at criminality, even in her lover—"

"We haven't anything to base a charge of criminality on."

"Nothing positive, maybe. But what I overheard in Copah seems to lean that way—not to go any farther back in the mess."

"Do you think so?"

"I'm thinking so hard enough to make me run the wheels off this wagon to keep in touch with that Fleetwing Eight somewhere ahead of us."

As he spoke, the roadster was topping a slight rise, and Landis pointed out a faint red dot in the forward distance. "You've got the touch," he remarked.

After this, for an interminable time, the two flying cars held their relative positions. From time to time Landis looked over his shoulder. There were no headlights in sight to the rear. If Canby was making the moonlight run, as planned, the headlights of his car were not yet visible.

"Needn't look for him, I guess," Markham offered, at length. "We're hitting it up a good bit faster than he'll want to hurry his passengers."

It was not until they began to draw in toward the foothills at the northwestern edge of the desert that they lost sight permanently of the red dot in advance. They came to the little way station of Atropia on the railroad, where the road forked.

"Here's where we balk," Markham announced, slowing down. Then he recalled what Canby had said to the man who was driving the Fleetwing, "Your route book will show you where to turn off." But which was the "turn off"—to the left with the railroad, or to the right up the mountain?

Climbing out, they crossed the tracks to the railroad station. When they stepped inside they almost ran into the arms of a group of roughly dressed men, each man nursing a Winchester. Markham apologized for stumbling over the feet of one of the men.

"My fault," said the one whose feet had suffered. "I wasn't looking for anybody to open the door. Are you traveling—or just going somewhere?"

"Both," said Markham with a grin. "More particularly, we are trying to keep in touch with three—er—friends just ahead of us in a Fleetwing Eight, and we don't know which road they've taken. Perhaps you can help us. Do both of these roads go over to Brewster in the Timanyoni?"

"They do." The speaker was evidently the leader of the squad of armed men. "The one to the left follows the railroad as far as it can, and then climbs the Timanyoni range by way of Led Horse pass. The other begins to climb right here and goes in over Dump mountain, and the two come together as one in the big hills south of Brewster."

"Thanks," said Markham; "but we don't know which way our—the Fleetwing went."

"I can help you there. It went up the mountain."

"That helps us," Markham asserted. Then, "A mining man, are you? I didn't know there were any mines over here."

"There are not many. Ours, the Cinnabar, is about the only one shipping ore just now. Broughton's my name."

"Markham is mine," was the prompt rejoinder; "and this is my friend, Owen Landis. Much obliged for the information about the roads. We'll be getting along before our Fleetwing party gets too far ahead of us."

As they went out the young mine owner followed them.

"I'm no alarmist," he said, "but are you gentlemen 'heeled,' as we say out in this part of the world?"

Markham grinned and pulled out his two automatics—much to Landis' astonishment, since Markham had neglected to mention his purchase.

"Will these do?"

"Fine and dandy, if you know how to use 'em. Reason I spoke was that we're down here for our payroll money—it's coming in on Forty-One—and I had a hint that Red Gunter and his gang might try to grab it off. That's why so many of us are here with the bells on. But if there's anything in the rumor, and they are after us, they likely wouldn't bother with you. So long," and he went back into the station building.

As the two friends reached the car the distance-diminished bellow of a locomotive whistle broke the silence of the desert night.

"There comes Broughton's train," said Landis. "Let's get away ahead of his truck. Then we won't have to pass it on the mountain road."

"You didn't speak soon enough," Markham grumbled, kicking a flat tire under the roadster. "I wonder what did that?"

Whatever had done it, the tire had to be changed, and they fell to work. When it came to the replacement they found that the spare was only about half inflated and would have to be pumped up—by hand. While they were rigging the pump the train came thundering in, made its brief halt, and went clamoring on.

Shortly after the disappearance of the train they heard the starting roar of the mine truck's motor, and a moment later the truck, with its load of armed men passed them. The young mine owner was at the wheel.

After the truck had gone, they found the tire pump in their roadster's equipment kit had a leaky check-valve, and wouldn't hold long enough to put the proper pressure into the half-inflated tire. While they were taking turns at the leaky pump, the railroad agent came across on his way home, and asked if he could help them out.

"Not unless you can tell us where we can borrow a decent tire pump," said Landis.

"Why, yes," was the friendly answer. "I've got a flivver, and a tire pump is about the most useful attachment it has. Wait, and I'll fetch it."

He crossed to a shed behind the nearest of the half-dozen darkened houses and presently returned with the pump, good-naturedly taking a hand and helping them fill the big spare.

"You've saved our lives," Markham said, returning the borrowed pump. "Thanks a thousand times. Good night."

As he started the motor he glanced at the dash clock.

"It was just midnight when we stopped, and now it's a quarter to one; three-quarters of an hour wasted—time enough to put that Fleetwing thirty miles ahead! That's the toughest piece of luck we've struck yet!"

But, as they were soon to learn, ill-luck was not through with them. Before they had made more than a couple of miles up the stiff mountain grade the roadster's motor sputtered, began to miss, and then stopped dead, the brakes slipped and let the car drift backward.

Landis caught at the emergency brake and stopped the drift. As he did it, he pointed at the gasoline gauge on the dash and said, "Look at that, will you!"

Markham looked. "What do you know about that! I told those garage fellows at Copah to be sure and fill her up—you heard me! What the devil and Tom Walker are we to do now, I'd like to know!"

"The little railroad man back there at the station?" Landis suggested. "Maybe he has an extra can of gas."

Markham turned the car and let it drift down to the railroad hamlet. The agent had gone to bed, and they had to get him up. Again western kindliness came to the fore.

"Just wait till I can get dressed and we'll see."

They waited, perforce, and when the little man came out he said, "McDowell—he keeps the store—may have a can or two."

There was another wait while the agent hammered on the door of McDowell's emporium; and when it was finally opened more uncertainty ensued. The storekeeper "disremembered." He might have some. He'd come down and see.

MASTER GEM THIEF TELLS POLICE HOW HE PULLED JOBS

"Robin Hood" Obtained Information About Jewels on Handball Court.

Newark, N. J.—Affable, cultured, yet well versed in the jargon of the underworld, Arthur Barry, regarded as America's most cunning and dangerous jewel robber, gave police details of his astonishing career of crime.

He pictured himself as a sort of modern, romantic Robin Hood who robbed only the wealthy, from which he confessed, police said, of thieving between $5,000,000 and $10,000,000 in gems.

Barry, who made a daring escape from Auburn prison three years ago, was captured in a farmhouse near Andover, N. J., by a ruse. He accepted his arrest quietly, but regretted he had no chance to "shoot it out" with the detectives. He remarked:

Life Term Awaits Him.

"If I'd had the chance I'd have shot it out until the last bullet, and kept that for myself. What's waiting for me now? The book."

"The book" is thieves' jargon for life imprisonment.

Barry insisted he had nothing to do with the Lindbergh baby kidnaping. He was questioned about the abduction, because a ladder was found at the scene of the kidnaping, and because a footprint might have been that of a lame man.

Barry frequently used a ladder, and he is lame from a hip wound.

The thief disclosed he had enough of the proceeds of his criminal career to yield an income of nearly $100 a week.

Robbed Only Wealthy.

Long Island, Miami, Palm Beach and Key West, were the most profitable fields for his operations, Barry told inquisitors. He said:

"The fat old matrons there loved to play handball with me. I'd find out where they lived, and then put on a surprise party for them.

"I robbed only the wealthy. If a woman can carry around a pearl necklace, she knows where her breakfast is coming from.

"She knows where she can get strawberries and cream in December, even if that pearl necklace is gone."

Drops Funeral Plans Because "Corpse" Lives

New York.—The de luxe funeral that was planned for Daniel Sullivan of New York city never came off—because Daniel wasn't dead.

He seemed as sorry about everything as did the others who had gone to considerable trouble preparing to put him away.

"Go right on thinking I'm dead," he told his young wife, Madeleine. "It's okay by me."

Mrs. Sullivan decided the thing to do was to get a divorce or an annulment. Daniel left home in July with a casual goodby and failed to return. Mrs. Sullivan was much concerned, but there wasn't anything she could do about it.

Recently she read that "Daniel Sullivan" had drowned and that his body was being held in the morgue. She identified the body as that of her Daniel. She sent a mortician to give Daniel a funeral he could be proud of. While on her way to tell some friends about his death she came face to face with Daniel.

"You're dead!" she exclaimed.

"You're cuckoo," retorted Daniel. "Give me $3."

"I'll give you the air," said Mrs. Sullivan.

Boy, 11, Is Arrested as Slayer of Baby Cousin

Tucson, Ariz.—An eleven-year-old boy was placed under technical arrest charged with having murdered his one-year-old cousin in a fit of childish rage.

The boy, Lupe Merilla, was believed to have beaten the infant girl to death in a blind reprisal for a whipping he received at the hands of his grandmother.

The grandmother had left the house, and when she returned, she said, the boy was nowhere to be found, and the baby lay unconscious on the floor, her face and body bruised. Apparently she had been beaten with bare fists.

The boy was found later in a neighbor's house. His grandmother sent him to the home of his parents at Ajo, near here, when it was thought that the infant was not seriously hurt. Then the child died.

Idle Curiosity Leads Way to Old Gold Mine

Santa Fe, N. M.—Curiosity may bring a fortune to Mrs. Blanche Trigg. The prospective wealth will come from an abandoned gold mine, near Albuquerque, possibly of Spanish origin. Old slag from an unascertained source aroused the curiosity.

Mrs. Trigg found the slag while walking along the Rio Perche river. No smelter was in sight so she asked C. H. Hayes, mineralogist, to make a survey. He found the old gold mine.

Snake Solves Robbery

Florence, Ala.—Police found no clews to the robbery of a store here until they remembered the merchant, as a hobby, kept a rattlesnake in the showcase. They inquired at hospitals until they found Cleburne Hale suffering from snake bite. He confessed and was arrested.

HONORED BY PLACE IN HALL OF FAME

High Distinction Accorded to American Women.

The women of the Hall of Fame are Mary Lyon, Emma Willard, Maria Mitchell, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Frances E. Willard, Charlotte Cushman and Alice Freeman Palmer. The first three were chosen in 1905; the next two in 1910; Charlotte Cushman in 1915, and Mrs. Palmer in 1920.

Mary Lyon, born in 1797 at Buckland, Mass., founded the Mount Holyoke Female seminary in 1837 and soon gave it a high reputation and extensive patronage. She died at South Hadley in 1849. Maria Mitchell, also of Massachusetts, was born in the island of Nantucket in 1818. She became a distinguished astronomer, and was professor of astronomy at Vassar from that school's opening in 1865 until a few months before her death in 1889. In 1847 she discovered a comet, and was decorated by the king of Denmark for this achievement.

Emma Willard, born in 1787 in Berlin, Conn., became a teacher and an educational writer. From 1821 she was principal of a seminary at Troy, N. Y. She wrote a history of the United States and a number of other histories, and died in 1870. Frances E. Willard, temperance reformer, was born at Churchill, N. Y., in 1839, was an organizer of the W. C. T. U. and its president from 1879, and in 1891 was made the first president of the World's Women's Christian Temperance union. She died in 1898.

Harriet Beecher was born in Litchfield, Conn., in 1811, the sixth child of the celebrated preacher, Lyman Beecher, and sister of the even more celebrated one, Henry Ward Beecher. In 1836, having moved to Cincinnati, Ohio, with her family, she was married to Prof. Calvin E. Stowe. In 1850 she wrote "Uncle Tom's Cabin," which was followed by many other books and papers. She died in Hartford in 1896.

Charlotte Cushman, the most distinguished of the early American women of the stage, was born in Boston in 1816 and made her debut in 1835, later appearing in all parts of the United States and in England. She died in 1876. Alice Freeman Palmer was born in Colesville, N. Y., in 1855 and died in Paris in 1902. She was a professor, and later president of Wellesley from 1879 to 1887, and was dean of the women's department of the University of Chicago for several years thereafter.

Half Right, Anyhow

Alberta, of the fourth grade, went to the fifth grade teacher and said: "Miss H. wants to know whether you have your pitchfork at school?"

"Do you mean pitch pipe?" she was asked.

"Yes, that's it," said the messenger. "I knew it was 'pitch something.'"

Literary Pauper

"I am convinced of the truth of the saying that there is no money in literature," said Mrs. Brown.

"Why?" asked her friend.

"Because George always seems hard up since he got acquainted with those men who make books."

World Circumnavigation

No one has ever gone around the world at its 25,000-mile circumference at the equator. Magellan sailed a greater distance as he had to go far south to round Cape Horn and Cape of Good Hope and return north of the equator to his starting place. The Graf Zeppelin followed almost a zigzag course over part of its route. Byrd usually is said to have flown around the pole rather than around the earth. These records are relative. As matters now stand Post and Gatty have the record for the combination of the greatest distance in the shortest time.

GARFIELD TEA A Natural Laxative Drink

Makes You Lose Unhealthy Fat

A lady from Norwich, Conn., writes: "I lost 16 lbs. with my first bottle of Kruschen. Being on night duty it was hard to sleep days but now since I am taking Kruschen I sleep plenty, eat as usual and lose fat, too."

To take off fat—take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast—one bottle that lasts 4 weeks costs but a few cents—get it at any drugstore in America. If this first bottle fails to convince you this is the SAFE and harmless way to lose fat—your money gladly returned.

Don't accept anything but Kruschen because you must reduce safely.

What Can You Do For The Pains Of Rheumatism?

Pain Ended In Few Minutes, This Way

It has now been discovered by thousands of rheumatic sufferers that the pains of that distressing disorder can be eased in as little as a few minutes . . . relief and comfort in almost as little time as it takes to tell!

Doctors advise two tablets of Bayer Aspirin taken with a full glass of water. Then a rest of a few minutes . . . and that is all. Pain is eased quickly—sometimes almost unbelievably.

Relief comes so fast because of the peculiar quick-dissolving property of Genuine Bayer Aspirin. The tablets you take dissolve almost INSTANTLY in your stomach. And thus you get practically instant relief. The fastest, safe relief—it is said.

TAKE 2 BAYER ASPIRIN TABLETS

DRINK ONE FULL GLASS OF WATER

Remember it is Genuine Bayer Aspirin which claims this quick-dissolving, quick-acting property. So be careful that you get the real article when you buy. See that any box or bottle you purchase is clearly marked "Genuine Bayer Aspirin." And that any tablet you take has the name "Bayer" stamped on it in the form of a cross. Then you will get quick relief.

Remember that when you buy. And remember, too, that Genuine Bayer Aspirin Does Not Harm the Heart.

32,000 Deer Shot In State

According to reports, all but a few of the army of 55,000 big game hunters who spent the ten days between November 15 and 25th in the north woods, have now been checked in at their homes.

Reports to the office of W. D. Stewart, state game and fish commissioner, are that the number of deer taken will approximate 32,000, about 4,000 more than in the last open season two years ago when it rained for nearly seven days out of the ten set out for hunting. This year we had fine tracking snow and few, if any, wounded deer were left in the woods.

Stewart said hunters had been more careless than usual and that apparently an unprecedent number of arrests and seizures had been made. Eleven hunters were killed accidetally and at least thirty were wounded.

Hunting Fatal to 35 People

Upward of 35 persons perished during the season big game hunt just closed in three north central states, Minnesota, Wisconsin and Michigan but game authorities Monday said the toll not surprisingly high consindering the number of nimrods participating.

In the three states, at least 150,000 men and women tramped the woods in pursuit of deer and the total kill, based on preliminary estimates, apparently aggregated 75,000 animals.

The number of hunters was apportioned equally among the three states and the deaths likewise were almost evenly distributed with the statistics giving Wisconsin 14; Michigan 10 and Minnesota 11.

Predominating in the cause of fatalities was the factor of one hunter mistaking another for either a dear or bear. Accidental discharge of weapons was another hazard.

SCHOOL NOTES

HIGH SCHOOL

Some of the high school students together with the 6th, 7th and 8th grade pupils are practicing a one-act Christmas play, "It Happened in Bethlehem." The cast of 14 characters include the shepherds and their families, the Three Wise Men, and Mary and Joseph.

Grades I and II

The children are all busy working on their parts in the Christmas program.

The second grade are working on a Nativity scene for the sand table.

We all have been designing wrapping paper for Christmas gifts.

Only Ruby and Elaine had 100 in Spelling on Friday.

Grades III, IV and V

Our room is practicing for the Christmas program which will be given next week. We are giving "The Fairies' Christmas Tree."

Grades VI, VII and VIII

Gertrude Nohre had the best paper in the 7th and 8th Grade Citizenship Check-Up Test Friday.

We finished the study of South America in our seventh grade Geography this week. Friday we had a test in which Arnold had the best paper.

The sixth grade Geography class is making booklets of the British Isles.

A number of ladies gathered at the Mrs. C. Rustad home on Friday, Dec. 9, and gave Miss Ruth Rustad a kitchen shower.

Building for the Future

Planning and building for the future is what makes a business successful.

What we want to do is to build for the future patronage of every producer of cream, poultry and eggs of the community.

The average cream station is not building up the future cream market of the community in which they operate, but instead are instrumental in tearing down the dairy industry. "In what manner?" you may ask. In encouraging the marketing of poor quality cream—resulting in a poor quality of cream—resulting in a poor quality of butter being put on the market, which decreases consumption of butter and causes surpluses and low prices.

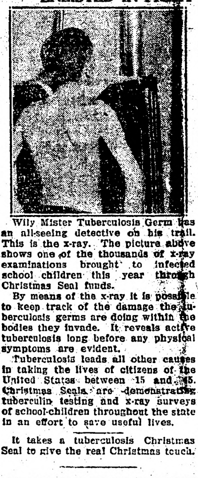
Thanksgiving Turkey Pool Largest of Kind in World

The Thanksgiving turkey pool of Land O' Lakes Inc., was the largest pool of its kind in the world, according to B. O. Norby, manager of the plant at Thief River plant. Of the 105 carloads in the pool, 53 were shipped thru the Thief River Falls plant and the balance came in from a large number of towns in this section.

Fifteen cars were also shipped from that point by Swift & Co., and nine by Peterson-Biddick.

SCIENCE'S MAGIC EYE ENLISTED IN FIGHT



Wily Mister Tuberculosis Germ has an all-seeing detective on his trail. This is the x-ray. The picture above shows one of the thousands of x-ray examinations brought to infected school children this year through Christmas Seal funds.

By means of the x-ray it is possible to keep track of the damage the tuberculosis germs are doing within the bodies they invade. It reveals active tuberculosis long before any physical symptoms are evident.

Tuberculosis leads all other causes in taking the lives of citizens of the United States between 15 and 45. Christmas Seals are demonstrating tuberculin testing and x-ray surveys of school-children throughout the state in an effort to save useful lives.

It takes a tuberculosis Christmas Seal to give the real Christmas touch.

AS KNOWLEDGE GROWS TUBERCULOSIS GOES

How much have I gained?

Growing is a serious business to Minnesota school boys and girls who check their gains monthly on Christmas Seal growth graphs. Building healthy children by practice of proper health habits is an important phase of the tuberculosis-prevention program. Among the things Christmas Seals brings to schools to promote health are: Monthly lessons, posters, first aid books, playground materials, first aid kits, drinking cup and paper towel containers and thermometers.

Seek Gas Tax Amendment

A constitutional amendment to place all gasoline tax money in the state road and bridge fund was favored at a meeting of the Minnesota Good Roads committee Monday. Ole Langhaug, Evansville, chairman, said such an amendment would make it possible for the legislature to apportion money so a larger part of it would be available for construction of farm-to-market roads and further relieve the burden of taxation on land.

Hard To Keep Going

It is difficult to get a united business front in a small town. Start a campaign for better business or for this, that or the other and the work of pushing it is soon left to the faithful few. The great majority are contented to sit back and let it work or let it die. The tradesman who is contented to stand aloof and wait for customers drawn to his business center by the efforts of others may reap some pecuniary benefits but is not playing fair with himself or with his fellow townsmen. He is not contributing his share in building a busy mart.

Champion Flockmaster

Frank Passi, of Pitt, is winner of first place and the title of "Champion Flockmaster" in the 1932 Minnesota lamb production contest, which set a new record for the number of contestants finishing. Passi's fifty ewes produced an average of 154 pounds of lamb apiece. It was Mr. Passi also who set the previous record of 159.8 pounds of lamb per ewe when he was the 1930 champion. The contest had thirty-four contestants finishing.

In Class 1 (25-50 ewes), Fred Bridges of Williams, placed 3rd, while Martin Bergan, also of Williams, was fifth in Class 2 (50-100 ewes).

The Minnesota Livestock Breeder's Association, which sponsored the contest, will distribute $500 in cash prizes to the participants, and in addition, will give gold medals to Mr. Passi, and C. E. Tage, of Rock county, who won first place in Class 2 of the contest.——The Williams Northern Light.

To Hold Annual Meeting

The Rosewood Shipping Assn. will have their annual business meeting on Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 21. They have shipped out close to 25 carloads of stock this year, and for bulk of shipments it has been the largest year since they organized in 1916. Emil Anderson has been manager for the past few years.

Rosewood Farmers Club Held Annual Meeting

The Rosewood Farmers Club held their 18th annual meeting in that village last Saturday night. Officers for next year will include President John Hanson, Secretary Ted Thompson and Treasurer Olaus Mattson. The club meets twice a month, besides sponsoring numerous social events for the benefit of their members and friends.

They are now installed in their own home, having purchased the bank building from the State Banking Dept., and have about 34 shareholders.

Band Held Annual Meeting

The Holt Community Band held its annual meeting Tuesday night at the schoolhouse, with twenty-three members present.

Rev. L. M. Redal was re-elected president; W. Sandberg, sec'y-treas.; and E. Loven and O. E. Sovde, directors. B.C. Hagglund was chosen third member of the board of directors.

The band is now over a year old, and is acquiring professional snap and finish.

Several new selections are being rehearsed, and for this reason it was stressed that members attend rehearsals regularly, so that band progress will be uniform.

Red Lake Has Youngest Sheriff

When Sheriff Roy Reynolds of Oakland county, Michigan, claimed to be the youngest sheriff in the United States, he claimed a title to which he is not entitled, for Sheriff Carl A. Kankel of Red Lake county in Minnesota has Sheriff Reynold's age record beaten by at least 3 years. If taken at the time Sheriff Kankel took possession of the sheriff's office he had him, beaten by 5 years, says the Red Lake Falls Gazette.

When Sheriff Kankel was sworn in he was only 26 years of age, and at the present time is only 28 years of age, and we are therefore claiming him as the youngest sheriff in the United States.

Many Turkeys Shipped from Holt

The Carlson Mercantile Company done a big turkey business here for the Christmas market. During the two weeks period ending Monday, they purchased 127,000 pounds of dressed turkeys from the farmers in this community. At Thanksgiving they shipped out 77,000 pounds.

In taking the figures for both shipments which amounts to 204,000 pounds and figuring the average weight per bird, this would make a flock of 18,545 turkeys.

According to W. E. Daly, who done the buying for the company here for the past two weeks, some of the finest turkeys that could be raised were sold here and brot the farmers as much money as they could get any other place.

Those whom we have talked with concerning a local turkey market state that they appreciate the service given the people in this territory by the Carlson Mercantile Company in setting up a local turkey market which not only saves them a lot of miles in hauling but, also pays them the top price for their birds.

For the size of our town we believe our record will stand in as much as the Carlson Mercantile company has shipped out seven carloads.

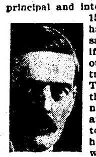
More Squirming to Avoid Payment of War Debts to America—Repeal and Beer Worry Members of Congress Assembling for Session.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

GREAT BRITAIN was still hopeful that the United States would not insist that the $95,550,000 war debt principal and interest, due December 15, must be paid. She had the money necessary, and would pay if there was no way out of it, but kept on trying to find a way. The cabinet approved the terms of a new note to Washington and even King George took a hand and helped decide what was best to be done. The king had a long interview with Neville Chamberlain, chancellor of the exchequer, who laid before him the proposal of the treasury which is dominated by Montagu Norman, head of the Bank of England. This presumably was that Britain should refuse to pay now or, at least, should pay into a blocked account, not transferring any money to America at this time.



Neville Chamberlain

Opposed to this view was that of the foreign office, upheld by Prime Minister MacDonald, that payment should be made promptly if the new request for postponement were refused, and that the entire matter of international debts be taken up with the Roosevelt administration when it comes into power. It was indicated that the foreign office had won out in the controversy.

France, the most determined of the opponents of payment, was passing the buck to England, Premier Herriot's government seeking to hold off decision and even parliamentary discussion until the British course was announced. Many of the deputies, however, were rebellious and sought to force the government to a showdown.

DIRECTLY connected with the war debt affair was the fall of the pound sterling, long the unit of international finance, to unprecedentedly low prices. By the middle of the week the European gold standard exchanges also weakened considerably, and at the same time the Japanese yen and Chinese currencies broke badly.

From London came reports that there had developed a sudden scarcity of available dollars in the world markets that Britain may purchase to pay the United States. The evidence was that American currency had been bought up in France and elsewhere by exchange brokers as part of a scheme to depress the pound for the benefit of bears on sterling.

BEER would seem to be occupying too prominent a place in the American public mind, were it not for the national income and employment relief features involved in the restoration of the beverage to a legalized status. Early in the week Speaker Garner devised a plan to put the hesitant legislators on the spot. The drys and semi-drys had been asserting that a measure legalizing beer and possibly light wines should not be pressed to passage until a resolution for repeal of the Eighteenth amendment had been put through. So Mr. Garner drew up such a resolution and announced that he would insist on its being put to a vote in the house on Monday, the first day of the short session. It was a resolution for flat repeal, with no mention of protection for the dry states.

Speaker Garner

Many congressmen, both Democrats and Republicans, called on the speaker with protests and pleas for delay, and Mr. Garner began to weaken, saying that if he found there was considerable objection to consideration of his resolution he would just as soon back up and say: "We will wait." Fred Britten of Chicago and other eminent wets tried to keep the speaker to his determination, Britten assuring him that the Republican side of the house would supply more than 100 votes for the repeal resolution. But there was no certainty of more than 130 Democratic votes, so it was doubtful whether the necessary two-thirds majority could be obtained. Later in the week some of the dry members from the South were reported to be sliding over to the repeal side and the prospects of the resolution were considered brighter.

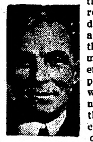
REPRESENTATIVE CARL VINSON of Georgia, chairman of the house committee on naval affairs, had a long talk with President-Elect Roosevelt at Warm Springs, and came away with his former "big navy" attitude considerably changed. He did not quote Mr. Roosevelt, but announced that he would favor drastic cuts in the naval building program and general economies. He declared at least $100,000,000 could be pared from the naval budget and said he was now willing that the building program should be reduced to a point far below the maximum set by the treaty of London.

From what Mr. Vinson said it was apparent that Mr. Roosevelt hopes to provide the United States with a small but powerfully effective navy. He thinks, too, that economies can be effected by the consolidation of some bureaus and a better control of all purchases.

PRESIDENT-ELECT ROOSEVELT held a series of conferences on farm relief with farm organization leaders and legislators, including Senators Robinson, Wheeler and Bankhead, and Henry Morgenthau, and the net result seemed to be a probability that nothing would be done during the short session except the enactment of some emergency measures such as price fixing and perhaps mortgage refinancing. Mr. Roosevelt declined to announce his own plan in advance, saying "That would be too much like telling congress what to do."

Farm leaders in Washington said they thought Mr. Roosevelt wants to meet the 1933 crop emergency and that they are willing to accept temporary measures such as the price-fixing bill that was proposed in the previous session.

HENRY FORD spent the week in the Detroit hospital that bears his name, recovering from an operation for strangulated hernia. The operation, which included removal of the appendix, was pronounced a success, and within three days the automobile manufacturer's temperature, pulse and respiration were back about to normal. By that time the hospital physicians and members of the Ford organization felt assured that the multi-millionaire's recovery was a matter only of rest and quiet. Members of his immediate family, who visited him daily, were no longer anxious about his condition. By the time this is read he may have been permitted to leave the hospital for his home.



Henry Ford

DEATH took another congressman, this time the victim being James C. McLaughlin, Republican representative from the Ninth Michigan district and dean of that state's delegation. Stricken with heart disease while on a tour of Virginia, he died at Marion. Mr. McLaughlin, who was a member of the ways and means committee, was defeated in the recent elections by Harry W. Musselwhite, Democrat. His death makes the party lineup in the house at the "lame duck" session 208 Republicans, 220 Democrats, one Farmer-Labor, and six vacancies.

EXPANSION of its regulatory authority over public utility companies is recommended to congress by the power commission in its annual report. The body urges that it be authorized to require concerns with federal licenses, including holding companies to submit any information desired as an aid to their supervision. The two fundamental purposes in view, the commission said are:

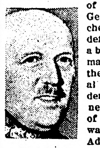
"First: Regulation of the holding company in relation to the operating company and through the operating company to the consumer of electrical energy; and, second, regulation of the holding company in relation to the investing public, which is principally interested in the securities of such holding company."

JUST as soon as there is a let up in the depression and federal finances permit, the regular army should be increased by 2,000 officers and 40,000 enlisted men, in the opinion of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, chief of staff. In his annual report the general said the army already has been reduced below the level of national safety.

"The regular army should be ready at all times," General MacArthur said, "to furnish any troops required by internal emergencies and initial defense against attack. The national defense act provided 18,000 officers and 280,000 men. This has been progressively reduced to 12,000 officers and 125,000 enlisted men, including Philippine scouts. On June 30, 1932, the actual figures were 12,180 officers and 119,888 enlisted men."

DONAL BUCKLEY, a retired shopkeeper who was a rebel against British rule for years, was appointed by King George to be governor general of the Irish Free State, on the advice of President De Valera, whose close friend he is. London was rather shocked by the appointment, many regarding it as a distinct attempt to belittle the king and bring the office of governor general into disrepute. Buckley succeeds James McNeill, who was forced out of office by De Valera.

THROUGHOUT another week President Paul von Hindenburg sought to find a man who could form a new ministry for Germany. His best bet of the seven days was Gen. Kurt von Schleicher, the minister of defense, who is probably the strongest man in public life in the reich. The general was willing to undertake the task, but needed the support of the Nazis, and this was denied him by Adolf Hitler who continued to hold the ground that there should be no government unless headed by himself. However, there was hope that Hitler would yield in later conferences. If not, there was a chance that the President might instruct Von Schleicher to form a cabinet and dissolve the reichstag. Or else, he might create a "business cabinet" under Von Papen and let it carry on, regardless of public opinion.



Gen. Von Schleicher

The Nazis said if the government dissolved the reichstag forcibly, this would be considered by them an illegal act and would evoke an "illegal answer."

PRESIDENT MACHADO of Cuba is not afraid of his political foes, who have so often sought his life; and he is determined to restore internal peace if possible. He ordered Gen. Alberto Herrera, chief of staff, to release 80 political prisoners, and the following day he directed that 66 other oppositionists be let out of the penitentiary on the Isle of Pines. Military rule was discontinued throughout the island except in Havana.

Machado's enemies said his magnanimity was due to unofficial pressure from the United States, but he denied this flatly.

EAMON DE VALERA, president of the League of Nations council, passed the Lytton commission report on Manchuria on to the league assembly, calling that body to convene in special session on December 6. The Japanese special representative, Yosuke Matsuoka made the usual reservation to this action in line with the Tokyo contention that the assembly is not competent to handle the Sino-Japanese affair, including the status of Manchuria.

Yosuke Matsuoka

The council dismissed the Lytton commission, but stipulated that it should consider itself subject to recall to submit whatever information the assembly may require. To this also Matsuoka objected without avail. "As you know," he said, "we have been taking the view that the commission is no longer in existence."

The committee of nineteen of the assembly met Thursday to prepare the program for the special session. Then some of the great powers will have to make clear their attitudes toward the far eastern situation and if the smooth spoken Matsuoka cannot prevail it may be Japan will withdraw entirely from the league. Certainly she shows no intention of letting go her hold on Manchuria, whatever the rest of the world may do.

PREMIER HERRIOT of France and Ambassador Dovgalevsky of Russia signed in Paris the new Franco-Russian treaty of nonaggression and conciliation. It is the first such pact that the Soviet government has completed with any of the great powers.

AGRICULTURAL depression did not seem to hurt the International Live Stock show in Chicago, for this year the affair was bigger and better than ever. The title of grand champion steer of the world was awarded to a Hereford from Texas, the selection being made as usual by Judge Walter Biggar of Scotland. The animal was raised and exhibited by Will Largent of Merkel, Texas, and after its brief reign it went through the customary process of sale by auction, slaughter and consumption by Chicago gourmets.

Herman Trelle of Wembley, Alberta, Can., won the crown of world wheat king for the third successive year, the judges pronouncing his wheat the finest they had ever seen. The new hay king is M. V. Gillett of Nebraska.

Coincident with the stock show was the congress of 4-H clubs, attended by many hundreds of young agriculturists of both sexes who competed for the usual fine prizes.

HEARTILY backing up the demands of President William Green, the American Federation of Labor in convention in Cincinnati adopted a resolution calling for the universal adoption in industry of the five day week and the six hour day.

Stirring the delegates to waves of applause Mr. Green said labor's patience with industrial management was at an end. Labor's paramount policy, he said, henceforth would be to resort to "forceful methods," if necessary, to establish the shorter work week. By those methods he meant use of every weapon in the union armory—economic, political, and industrial.

It was indicated by Mr. Green that the spearhead in the movement for the thirty hour week would be a demand on the federal government that it set an example by establishing that reform.

THE CHRISTMAS DINNER

WHO among us can affect to despise the gastronomic delights of the family Christmas dinner? The most sophisticated person must admit our festive board at Christmas is a place where the gods might love to linger. What a picture it presents to the eye. The big turkey browned to a golden crispness; the heaping dish of mashed potatoes, which need only the addition of the delicious gravy to convert them into manna, and the dressing, seasoned to just the right proportions. Then there is the crisp pleasing salad, the golden sweet potatoes, the big dish of creamed cauliflower; the celery, olives, pickles and cranberry sauce; the mince and pumpkin pies, the rich, fragrant coffee, and the raisins, nuts and other goodies that follow. Kings and emperors in the past have conferred high honors on those who set some especially wonderful meal before them, but no king nor emperor of any age ever sat down to a dinner that looks and tastes as good as that which is set on the tables of the great American home on Christmas day.—Katherine Edelman.

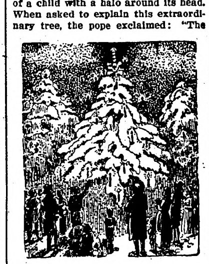
Origin of the Christmas Tree by Florence Studebaker

THE origin of the Christmas tree is much disputed and there are many popular legends concerning it. One popular tale pictures Martin Luther as attempting to describe the beauty of the snow-covered forest under the wintry sky. Suddenly the idea suggested itself. He hurried to the garden, cut a little fir tree, dragged it into the nursery, put some candles on its branches and lighted them. This was supposed to have happened on Christmas eve and the tale seeks to explain the origin of both tree and candles. One of the most popular German engravings represents Luther and his family grouped about the tree.

Another older German legend says St. Winifred is the originator of the idea. One day while surrounded by crowds of converts, the Saint was having a giant oak sawed down for use in Druidic worship. Suddenly a great wind rushed past the tree and sent it crashing backward where it destroyed everything in the path except a small fir tree. Because of the seeming miracle, St. Winifred decreed the fir tree be known as the Holy Tree, the tree of the Christ Child.

Still another authority declares the tree comes from the ancient Egyptian custom of decking houses at the time of the winter solstice with branches of the date palm—the symbol of life triumphant over death and an emblem of the starlit firmament. At the same time the Egyptians were decking houses with date palm branches, the Jews were celebrating the Feast of Chanuckah, in which lighted candles were a feature. A Greek festival at about this time is called "The Feast of Lights" and the Chinese festival of a corresponding period is called "The Feast of Lanterns." During the old Roman festival, pine trees were decorated with images of Bacchus, and the Christmas tree is believed by some to be a relic of this old custom.

The French have an interesting legend. In the Thirteenth century a huge tree was found, the branches were covered with candles, some of which stood erect and some upside down. On the top appeared a vision of a child with a halo around its head. When asked to explain this extraordinary tree, the pope exclaimed: "The tree represents mankind, the child is Christ and the candles are meant to indicate the good and bad human beings." Thereafter, according to this myth, the Christmas tree was used at Christmas time to bring happiness and good cheer.



"The Tree Represents Mankind," It Was Explained.

Now with all these vague traditions blended together we have as a final result the permanent establishment of the Christmas tree. Germany first decorated the tree with gifts. Not until the time of the marriage of Queen Victoria did the tree become a regular English institution. When the Germans emigrated to America, they brought the Christmas tree with them and we Americans borrowed it along with many other Christmas customs.—Indiana Farmer's Guide.

Printed Christmas Card Was Issued Back in '43

THERE is more humanity about the Victoria and Albert museum than its stiff brick exterior suggests.

The director has sent me a Christmas Picture Book, says a writer in the London Star. It reveals the fact that the first Christmas card ever printed was issued only as recently as 1843.

The card, which was printed for Sir Henry Cole, first director of the South Kensington museum, is reproduced, along with many other efforts by artists, to celebrate the nativity. They range from a walrus ivory relief from Cologne to a modern woodcut by Eric Gill. It is strange to see how the artistic wheel has turned full circle back to the medieval austerity.

But I can't help liking the first Christmas card, which "features," as the films say, a hearty meal. As the fat boy would say, "I likes eating best."

THREE CELEBRATIONS

THREE Christmases are celebrated every year in the Church of Nativity at Bethlehem. The first occurs in the Roman Catholic section on December 25; 13 days later the Greek Orthodox church hold their celebrations, to be followed by those of the Armenian church in another 13 days.

WHAT PATIENT NEEDED

A certain young woman of Punxsutawney, Pa., had been a patient at a hospital there. Though sent home as well, she kept returning day after day, insisting she was still out of sorts. The staff doctors could find no symptoms and were greatly worried. "It's a funny thing," she remarked one day, "I seem to feel all right as long as my temperature is being taken." They gave her a thermometer to carry home so that she could take her own temperature. She has not been back since.

How One Woman Lost 10 Lbs. in a Week

Mrs. Betty Luedeke of Dayton writes: "I am using Kruschen to reduce weight—I lost 10 pounds in one week and cannot say too much to recommend it."

To take off fat easily, SAFELY and HARMLESSLY—take one-half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast, go lighter on fatty meats, potatoes, butter, cream and pastries—it is the safe way to lose unsightly fat and one bottle that lasts 4 weeks costs but a trifle. Get it at any drugstore in America. If this first bottle fails to convince you this is the safest way to lose fat—money back.

But be sure and get Kruschen Salts—imitations are numerous and you must safeguard your health.

If you are happy enough, you will overlook most public problems.

THE BLACK BOX OF SILENCE
By Francis Lynde

SYNOPSIS

Owen Landis, young inventor, has developed an extraordinary "silencer," which is stolen from a safe in his laboratory. Landis tells Wally Markham, his chum, the only person, beside himself, knowing the combination of the safe, is Betty Lawson, with whom the inventor is in love. Markham takes a plaster cast of a woman's foot print, found beneath the window of the laboratory, and takes an opportunity to fit it to one of Betty's shoes. They are identical. Betty tells Markham Herbert Canby, a stranger, posing as a "promoter," had driven her home the previous night, and that she had dozed in the car. Markham does not tell Landis of his discovery. The safe in the bank at Perthdale is blown open and looted, the noise of the explosion being unheard. Satisfied that his "black box" is in the hands of crooks, Landis, with Markham, goes to Perthdale. Three strangers, claiming to be business men of Louisville, are the only possible suspects. Markham and Landis decide to follow them, although advices from Louisville seems to guarantee the standing of the three. At St. Joseph Markham learns Canby is driving west, with Betty Lawson and her father as his guests in the car. While he and Landis are sleeping, Markham's car is stolen and wrecked. He buys another, and they go on. At a hotel in Copah they meet Betty. She is surprised at their presence in the West, and explains the reason for her and her father's journey. Markham overhears a conversation between Canby and the three Louisville men which convinces him he is on the right track.

—9—

After a time the sleepy storekeeper came shuffling down, and a search was made for gas. It finally proved successful to the extent of unearthing three of the familiar five gallon cans, but the storekeeper had only a small funnel, and it had been carefully mislaid. After it had been found the clock on the roadster's dash had measured off the better part of another hour.

"We're out of the fight, so far as keeping cases on the Fleetwing is concerned," Markham grumbled, as the car stormed the grade.

They had surmounted the first long grade, of possibly five miles, when a sudden turn in the road brought a group of mine buildings into view, the scene partly lighted by the red glow of a conflagration at the roadside. Markham let the car roll slowly up. When he stopped, Broughton put a foot on the running board.

"Well, Red got us, after all. Blew the safe and the commissary all to h—l and set the wreck afire."

Landis saw two blanket-covered figures lying under a tree and said, "Casualties?"

"Yes; murder. My day foreman and the watchman. There was a gun battle; both of the foreman's guns were empty when we found them. But what's running us all ragged is the fact that nobody in the whole camp heard a sound while all this was going on; wouldn't have known about it till morning, I suppose, if a miner's girl in one of the cabins hadn't happened to wake up and see the light of the fire. Isn't it h—l?"

"What's that?" Landis cut in. "You say nobody heard the explosion? But perhaps there wasn't any explosion."

"Oh, yes there was; safe looks as if it had been hit by an H. E. shell. Besides, there was gun fire."

Just here one of his men drew Broughton away.

"Not much doubt as to who has your black box now, is there?" Markham asked Landis. "Not very much. The circumstantial evidence is piling in too thick and fast to leave much room for doubt."

"I don't want to believe that these men are the criminals," said Landis.

"Why not?"

"Don't you see! If they are, Herbert Canby is the fourth."

"Well, what if he is?"

"He is going to marry Betty."

"Ump! That's up to you, isn't it?"

"Not now. It has gone too far."

Markham made no comment upon this until after they had passed the point where the shorter road by way of Red Horse pass came in. Then he said, "You have only yourself to blame, Owen. It's just as I told you the night you showed me your invention; a girl can't wait forever. I don't suppose you have ever asked Betty to marry you."

"No, I haven't," was the straightforward confession. "It's this way. Betty has always had a small time of it as her father's daughter. The 'U' doesn't pay it's faculty members enough to warrant any other kind of time for their families. And she deserves something better."

"So you've been waiting until you could invent something that you could sell for enough money to let her wear diamonds? You don't know Betty Lawson half as well as I do, even if you are her lover! I—hello—what's that?"

In the bottom of the gulch, some [illegible] below the road, a fire, too [illegible] as a campfire, was [illegible] stopped the car. [illegible] "Doesn't seem to be anything down there to burn."

"No; but I haven't curiosity enough to make me climb down there to find out what it is. I don't know how you feel, but I'm about dead for sleep. Let's go."

Due to a blowout which hit them shortly after passing the gulch of the mysterious fire, and which imposed a rather tedious job of casing changing, the early summer dawn was breaking as they skirted Lake Topaz. A little later they came to a group of mine buildings, one of which bore the legend:

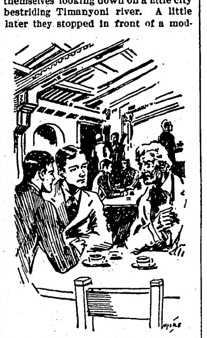
"LITTLE ALICE MINING COMPANY
"MAXWELL & STARBUCK."

"By George!" Markham exclaimed, as he read the sign. "I never knew before just where that mine was."

"What about it?" Landis asked.

"Why nothing much, except that I own a few shares of stock in it; one of the items in the little legacy my mother left me. She was distantly related to Starbuck; or rather to Mrs. Starbuck's family. I've never taken the trouble to look up the location of the mine. I dimly remember the Starbucks. They stopped over in Carthage with us on their wedding trip when I was a kid. If they live in Brewster, we'll look them up."

A few miles farther they found themselves looking down on a little city bestriding Timanyoni river. A little later they stopped in front of a modern hotel. Turning the roadster over to the uniformed "hostler" they went in to register.



"Canby Made a Barrel of Easy Money Out of Us Here—and Then Got His Own Feet Wet."

"Night driving?" queried the clerk.

"Yes; from Copah," Markham answered.

"Then you won't want to wait for the regular breakfast before you turn in. We can give you quick service in the grill. Or, if you like, I'll have it sent up to your suite."

"That will be better. Have you had anybody else in from the east this morning?"

"Yes; a party of three—came in a couple of hours ago. A Doctor Lawson and his daughter, and Mr. Canby."

"Nobody else?" Markham pressed.

"No. Were you expecting to meet friends here?"

"These three gentlemen from Louisville," said Markham, producing his memorandum of the three names.

The clerk read the names and smiled. "You've got your schedules mixed, some way," he suggested. "We have reservations made for these gentlemen for the twenty-eighth. You've beat them to it by a week or more."

"So?" said Markham. "That's a bit odd. They've been just ahead of us all the way across from Indiana, and they drove out of Copah last night a very short time before we did."

"Well," said the clerk, "they'll have to take what they can get, if they turn up now. Their date is the twenty-eighth. You say they left Copah ahead of you? Then you must have passed them somewhere on the road."

"Maybe we did," Markham offered; and with that they followed the boy to the elevator, somewhat mystified.

They were up in time to make the dining room for a late luncheon. At a table opposite sat an elderly man of a type which is fast disappearing, even in the farther West; the pioneer who had made good, and is at last able to take his ease in a civilization for which he was once one of the pathfinders.

Never hampered by the formalities, Markham passed his card across the table and got precisely the reaction the elderly man's appearance presaged.

"That's neighborly. Glad to know you, Mr. Markham. My name is Starbuck," and he reached across the table and shook hands.

"Thanks," said Wally, with his good-natured grin. Then, "Not, by any chance, Mr. William Starbuck, a partner in the Little Alice mine?"

The bronzed-faced man smiled. "There's only one of me, I guess."

"Um. You've just shaken hands with a faraway cousin by marriage, Mr. Starbuck; also, with a very small fractional owner in your mine. My mother was a Fairbairn on her mother's side; and once—I think it was on your wedding trip—you stopped off for a short time with us in Carthage. But, excuse me; you shook hands with me—won't you repeat the operation with my friend, Owen Landis?"

"Sure! And he's as welcome to the Timanyoni as you are, Walter."

"Gosh!" said Markham. "You don't mean to say you remember my name!"

"Sure I do; now that you've told me who you are. I recollect you as a fat-faced little chap, but, of course, I wouldn't have known you from Adam now. What are you and Mr. Landis doing?"

"No plans whatever; just driving about to see how far we can go on so many gallons of gas."

The mine owner nodded. "I see. You may not believe it, to look at me now, but I was young once, myself—and I sure had a restless foot. I'm sorry Mrs. Starbuck and the girls are on a trip east. If they were here, we'd have you both out of this dump, pronto; not that it isn't a pretty fair sort of posada, at that."

"I'll say it is," said Markham. "Wouldn't you, Owen?"

Landis agreed. "The Carthage Banner would run double-leaded editorials about it for a week, if we had a hotel as good as this at home."

"Speaking of Carthage reminds me," Starbuck put in. "There are three other people from your town in the hotel; got in this morning. Maybe you know 'em—or know about 'em?"

"We know two of them rather better than well. Professor Lawson used to make a mamma's pet of Owen, here, at the same time that he was doing his level best to flunk me in Physics Four."

Starbuck smiled. "I took an eyeshot at the professor—and at the daughter. I take it you'll both agree with me if I say that Miss Lawson is pretty enough to start a stopped clock?"

"Ask Owen," said Markham with a grin; and Starbuck switched to the third member of the party. "This Canby person, who writes himself down as from Carthage: do you know him, too?"

Markham answered for both. "Reasonably well; though we haven't known him very long. He is a comparatively newcomer in our town."

Starbuck's smile was grim. "Using the word you just now tacked onto your friends, the Lawsons, we know him a heap better than well, out here."

"Is it tellable?" Markham asked.

"Oh, sure. He was here all last summer booming a bauxite mining and reduction scheme; sold a good chunk of stock."

"And afterward?" Wally prompted.

"There wasn't any afterward, not so you could notice it. The boomed mine was—well you might say it wasn't exactly a straight fake, because there was, and is, a small deposit of the mineral in it, but not enough to make it a commercial proposition."

"All of which is mighty interesting to listen to," Markham commented. "The more so, because just now he is trying to float a factory-and-addition scheme—in our town. I'm wondering what brings him out here, right in the thick of his Carthage promotion."

"I might be able to tip you off as to that," said the mine owner. "Canby made a barrel of easy money out of us here—and then got his own feet wet. About half a mile above the Little Alice there is a mine that is older than anything else in this neck o' the woods. Some think it dates back to the time when all this region was a part of the Spanish possessions; anyway, it was here and worked out and abandoned long before any of the American prospectors came in. When Lake Topaz began to be a summer resort the old Quavapai, as it's called, became a sort of show place for tourists, like the Mammoth cave. About two years ago a bunch of tinhorn freezeouts from Tonopah came over here and reloaded the Quavapai; claimed they'd explored it and found new mineral in it. We never have known the real inside, but it's the general belief that they were salting the mine and fixing to stick somebody with it. Anyhow that's how it turned out. They sold the Quavapai to Canby; took his money and faded away."

"The biter bit, eh?" said Markham with a laugh. "Does he still own it?"

"Owns it and operates it. He has kept a small gang in it ever since he bought it; sending good money after bad, you'd say, because there has never yet been a pound of ore shipped from it. Just lately he has doubled his force; imported a lot of Mexicans from down Santa Fe way. Just what's at the bottom of all this, nobody knows. The place is guarded as if it were a diamond mine."

Starbuck glanced at his watch and pushed his chair back.

"Sorry, but I've got to chop it off," he said. "I'm due at the bank for a meeting. You'll be stopping over for a while, won't you?"

"Yes; so far as we know now," Markham said.

"That's the talk! I want to know you both better." Then to Markham, "Just take me in as one of the family and make such use of me as you can. As the Spaniards say, 'You are in your own house while you are with me!'"

RED INDIAN HELD MASTER OF CHASE

As Hunters, Race Has Never Been Surpassed.

Generally speaking, the principal occupation of the men of any American Indian tribe was that of hunting, and among no other people upon the whole face of the globe was the technique of the chase developed so highly.

The typical Indian hunter never has been surpassed with respect to ability to track and take game, and in the term hunting we may include fishing also, writes James Waldo Fawcett in the Washington Post.

It is supposed that the Indian found the western world plentifully stocked with buffalo, deer, bear, fox, wolf, rabbit, llama and guanaco, when he first entered the scene. But though there had been a variety of horses in South America at least before the appearance of the Indian, there were no horses at the moment of his coming; and it is to be noted that the Indian remained a pedestrian hunter until the period after the arrival of the Spaniards, when he caught and tamed the steeds which had escaped from them—a date not earlier than the end of the first quarter of the Sixteenth century.

However, the Indian either had the domesticated dog with him when he crossed from Asia or he quickly accomplished the domestication of the wolf he found here. At a very early point in his career, in any case, he hunted with dogs, though no special breed was developed for the purpose.

The Indians' weapons were the spear, the bow and arrow, and the club, all of which he probably brought from Asia and the harpoon which he likely invented much later as a natural outgrowth from the spear and the arrow. The throwing stick also was used by the Pueblos in the Southwest and the Eskimos in the North, and the blowgun was familiar to the inhabitants of the Gulf coast and the Atlantic slope regions.

Brush fences, corrals and pitfalls were built, and natural features of the landscape were commonly used—narrow canyons in the Southwest, for example—for collecting and isolating game. Traps and snares of great simplicity, but amazingly effective, were widely set and carefully watched, and nets were sometimes made and used by entire communities.

The Indian was a constructive communist in many respects, particularly in relation to the pursuit of large game. He rarely set out alone to hunt buffalo. On the contrary, his custom was to go only with a numerous company of his friends, and a buffalo hunt, especially after the arrival of horses, was a great social event, characterized by ceremonial rites and songs, fetiches and taboos.

But smaller animals were hunted by the Indian alone—a single free lance moving through the forest with the maximum of caution, more quietly than the objects of his search themselves. As the game declined in numbers his skill increased, until at the last he had developed an acuteness of technique without parallel in recorded history.

What makes a baby turn out to be PERFECT?

★Well-shaped head.
★Sound teeth in well-formed jaw.
★Firm tissue.
★Straight, strong bones.
These are points physicians look for, in judging a baby. How will your baby compare?

WILL that precious little one in your arms be a perfect specimen? Handsome? Happy? Healthy? Will he grow up so strong and fine and well that he'll be pointed out as one of Nature's lucky ones?

Of course, there are many things that play their part in shaping his future. Heredity. Pre-natal care. Favorable conditions at birth. But, more and more, physicians are stressing the importance of his early food.

If your own milk fails, what food contains the elements he needs in a form his baby stomach can digest with greatest ease?

Physicians make test with fifty babies

Recently, in a famous clinic, two specialists in infant diet fed a group of 50 average babies on Eagle Brand over a period of months—comparing results with other groups of babies similarly fed on other foods. Eagle Brand was the only food these babies received, except for the usual supplementary foods* now given even with mother's milk. Regularly, X-ray pictures of bones were taken. Tooth development was watched. Weights and heights recorded. Blood counts made. And at last came the verdict: Measured by every scientific test, the result was favorable to Eagle Brand. This simple diet—Eagle Brand with the usual supplementary foods*—had proved equal to the building of 100% babies!

THE TAX MENACE A GROWING CRISIS

By FRANCIS H. SISSON
President American Bankers Association

F. H. SISSON

No danger, economic or social, more seriously menaces our life, happiness and prosperity than the rising tide of taxes which threaten to engulf us. This is not simply a problem of the depression. It has been developing for many years, growing more serious all the time. The depression merely brought it to a climax. Unless drastic steps are taken to reverse this trend the problem will not end with the depression. It will continue to weigh down and retard progress for an indefinite period.

In city, county, state and nation the orgy of spending has run on. It is estimated that in the United States the total cost of all government is nearly five times what it was before the World War. Many localities have been brought to the verge of bankruptcy by their expenditures, while many have saddled their citizens with a debt burden that will darken their lives and hamper their progress for years to come.

The total cost of Federal, state and local government in the United States is estimated at forty-six million dollars a day. Based on national income in 1930, this represents about one-fifth the total income of our people, or about $110 for every individual in the nation. Total taxes in 1931 are estimated to have taken more than 22 per cent of the national income. It is occasion for serious thought on the part of everyone when one day's income out of every four or five must be contributed to the maintenance of government machinery.

Reductions Possible

United States Government expenditures were reduced one hundred and forty million dollars during the first quarter of the current fiscal year. The recent action of bankers in calling a halt to unnecessary expenditures of New York City as prerequisite to loans will reduce the cost of government in the country's metropolis, which is second in its expenditures to only the Federal Government. No state in the Union, in fact, no other government on this hemisphere, spends half as much as this one city. These savings in Federal and municipal costs are only the beginning of a movement needed throughout the country, if we are to be led out of depression into prosperity.

Unless the people can be made to realize that money for governmental expenditure can come only from their own pockets as taxpayers, casting depressing effects on both individual effort and general business, there is an imminent threat that we may be forced to meet economic difficulties similar to those that have so seriously handicapped other countries. The question is not primarily one of merely paring government salaries or shaving budgets, but rather of curtailing government activities for which we cannot afford to pay.

The idea that money for these mounting extravagances can be raised by following the slogan "Soak the Rich" is utterly fallacious, for such a policy will simply exterminate "the rich" and eliminate sources of revenue. It is also important to realize that corporate business in this country is in no position to withstand the effects of indefinite advances in tax rates. Current earning reports reveal that fact beyond shadow of doubt. The tax base must be broadened, and it therefore seems likely that Congress will be called upon to reconsider the sales tax, at least as a temporary measure to help meet a critical condition in the nation's finance.

Deposit 'Guarantee' Fails of Purpose

LOS ANGELES.—While the idea of the guarantee of bank deposits by some legally enforced plan seems to appeal to many people who give it casual thought, the fact is that it has not only failed in every instance in the eight states where the experiment was tried, but actually produced unsound banking and increased the number of failures, it was declared by the recent convention of the American Bankers Association held here.

"Guaranty of bank deposits carries an idea that naturally appeals to people in general on casual consideration," the declaration said. "However, in principle it is unsound and in practice it is unworkable. It has been tried in eight States and it has not only failed in every case, but it has resulted in increasing the number of bank failures. Taxing properly managed banks to make up losses of failed banks is not only unfair and unreasonable, but it weakens the whole banking structure. Again, guaranty of deposits places the incompetent and reckless banker on an equal footing with the able and conservative banker, which encourages bad banking at the expense of sound banking. We are therefore opposed to the passage of any law carrying a guaranty of bank deposits and believe that it is against the interest of the people of the United States to develop any such system."

Rosewood Couple Celebrate 50th Wedding Anniversary

Rosewood, Dec. 22.—(By Special Correspondent)—Today, Mr. and Mrs. John Bloom, local pioneers, reached their fiftieth milestone of married life. Mr. and Mrs. Bloom were married at Vedum, Bitterna pastorate in Wastergotland, Sweden, Dec. 22, 1882, and with Rev. A. Blomgren performing the ceremony. The next year Bloom left for America, coming by way of Quebec, and remaining for some time at Winnipeg where he was employed at city work. The same year he came to Crookston where he was employed at a farm during the fall, and also homesteaded on the quarter-section of land at this place and which has been his home ever since. Mrs. Bloom arrived here together with their oldest son John in the spring of 1884, and immediately joined her husband here.

In relating old reminiscences Bloom stated the passage across the ocean in those days took 17 days, and the cost of the ticket was $17. Bloom entrusted his passage to the North German Lloyd Line while Mrs. Bloom was a passenger on an Allen line steamer.

There have been ten children in the Bloom family, but two are dead. The eight living are John, a resident of Spokane, Wash.; Helmer, a foreman at the Ford truck works at Chicago; Mrs. L. M. Phil of Duluth; Mrs. Lloyd Crown of Red Lake Falls; Mrs. A. G. Ross of Thief River Falls; and Carl, Emil and Axel Bloom at home. They are members and supporters of the Mission church at this place, and hold a prominent place among the dairy and poultry farmers of this locality.

Homer McMurray a brother of W. F. McMurray and Hubert the son of the latter, left Monday evening by train for Barnsville, Ohio to spend the winter.

A Merry Christmas

We wish to extend this sentiment to our patrons

FARMERS CO-OPERATIVE CREAMERY CO.
HOLT, MINNESOTA.

MERRY CHRISTMAS

WHAT two words on human tongue are more heart-warming than those! They not only represent a friendly greeting, but in them are summed up the whole spirit of the Yuletide—brightness and laughter, joy of living and joy of giving, health and happiness, peace on earth and good will to all men.

It is a greeting which we will hear often in this community of ours during these happy days of the Christmas season. We will hear it on our streets, in our stores, along our country roads and in our homes. For ours is a friendly community and nowhere is that friendly greeting more sincere. It is not possible, however, for each of us to say "Merry Christmas!" to everyone and thus complete the happy circle of Yuletide good cheer.

But there is one who has that rare privilege, one who has been a welcome visitor at the firesides of the homes in this community throughout the year and who now claims the right to be the first to wish you joy at this joyous time. That one is your Home Paper.

So your Home Paper carries from you to all the community and from all the community to you this friendly greeting:

MERRY CHRISTMAS!

CHRISTMAS SEALS SAVE CHILDREN'S LIVES

"Rest, good food, fresh air and sunshine, and careful watching by a doctor."

Curly-haired Betty, infected with tuberculosis, counts off on her fingers the most important things for building up her health. She is under care in the children's department of one of Minnesota's sanatoria.

Found in time, Betty can be protected from ever breaking down with tuberculosis, a disease which today kills one of every three girls who die between 15 and 19. Christmas Seals find and protect children threatened with tuberculosis.

Help make the 1932 Christmas Seal a "depression proof commodity." Health defenses against the enemy tuberculosis are essential for all.

Tuberculosis is Public Enemy Number One. It takes more lives between the ages of 15 and 45 than any other disease. Christmas Seals carry a continuous campaign to wipe out this enemy.

Christmas Seals help prevent, find, and cure tuberculosis all year round. Use them generously on all Christmas packages, gifts, cards, and letters.

Christmas Seals mean cure for some, relief for many, and protection for all.

SCHOOL NOTES

HIGH SCHOOL

On Friday afternoon the High School will have its Christmas party.

We are all waiting for our Christmas vacation.

School starts again Tuesday, January 10.

Grades I and II

Elaine, Wayne, Lillian, Marian, Rueben K. and Ruby H. had 100 in Spelling on Friday.

The second grade received a new reader this week. They began the Bolenius Book II. On Friday they expect to complete their Winston "New Friends."

We are all trying hard to keep a secret. The big question now is "Whose name did you get?"

Grades VI, VII and VIII

All of us are wishing all of you a very merry Christmas and a happy New Year.

Lowell, Arnold and Glenn had 100 in the seventh grade Arithmetic self-testing drill Monday.

Dam Gates at Red Lake To Be Open This Winter

Dam gates located at the outlet of the Red Lake river at the lower edge of Red Lake will remain open during the present winter season in order to insure a sufficient supply of drinking water to the towns and cities served along the course of the river. Officials from East Grand Forks, Grand Forks, ThiefRiver Falls and Crookston conferred on the matter at a recent meeting and they now have the assurance that a man will be stationed at the dam during the winter and he will see to it that the gates remain open. The city water supply in Red Lake Falls is not altered by this mandate as this city is served by the Clearwater river. — Red Lake Falls Gazette.

Mrs. A. C. Conklin, Hjalmer Johnson and John Augustine returned home on Tuesday nite from Warren where they have served sixteen days on the petit jury.

GREETINGS

We take this opportunity to wish all our customers a Merry Christmas.

Prize Day Next Friday

Another prize drawing has been annouced for Friday, Dec. 30. The business men met on Wednesday and appointed a committee to select the prizes to be given away and also to attend to other details of the drawing.

The first prize of $10 has been split in two $5 prizes thus giving two instead of one a chance on the cash. Thirteen other useful merchandise prizes will be given away.

The drawing will be held at the Community hall on Friday, December 30 at 2:30 p. m., and all trade tickets must be in the jars by 2 o'clock that day.

Johnson With Credit Corp.

E. J. Johnson, former cashier of the Farmers State Bank of Stephen, has accepted a position with the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation of Minneapolis, his appointment being announced by that organization following a conference with Mr. Johnson in the Twin Cities a week ago.

The Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation is making loans to northwest farmers on chattel securities, at an interest rate of seven per cent, with the funds for these loans provided thru the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. Johnson will represent the organization as field man in this county, inspecting the chattels owned by farmers who may apply for loans. He began his new duties a week ago and has spent one day here at Holt.

Living Christmas Trees

IF THE price of a live Christmas tree seems high, why not make the tree serve as a gift to some members of the family. It is surely just as appropriate to give a gift for beautifying the home without as it is to give something for beautifying the home within. The tree is a gift that will not wear out nor deteriorate with age and will actually grow in value.—American Home.

Raid Leader Caught

Clyde Chitwood, of Red Lake Falls, Minn., charged as the leader of the gang that staged a spectacular raid on the Polk county jail at Crookston Oct. 22 and stole a machine gun, $500 in cash and 17 slot machines, has given a formal confession of his part in the robbery to police at Louisville, Kentucky, where he was captured recently.

Ray Yarberry, Louisville chief of police, said Chitwood gave a full confession to the jail holdup and offered to waive extradition and return to Minnesota for trial.

Sheriff Ira L. Haaven from Crookston has made a trip to Louisville and brot Chitwood to Crookston recently.

Five men raided the Polk county jail at 2:30 a. m., Oct. 22. They pounced upon James Duckworth, night jailer as he was making his rounds, then seized Deputy Sheriff Iver Forseth, and Clifford Larum, of Eldred, Minn.

The bandits taped the eyes of their victims and proceeded to loot the jail office leisurely. They took a Thompson machine gun and several rifles and pistols, 100 rounds of amunition and 17 slot machines containing an undetermined amount of money, then took $500 from the safe.

Most of the broken slot machines were recovered later near the town of Dorothy.

During the past week Sheriff Haaven has arrested other men whom are also charged with taking part in the robbery. It expected that the whole gang will soon be brot to justice.

Wood Bids Accepted

The board of directors of the local creamery opened bids last week for eighty cords of green wood and, they stated that the prices per cord delivered here was the lowest quoted for some time. Some parties agreed to bring wood for as low as $1.85 a cord.

Miss Christine Underlee and her mother from Hendrum, visited at the home of Rev. and Mrs. L. M. Redal over the week end.

From your bank:

Among greetings which you receive from friends everywhere, please include this sincere wish from your bank:

The Black Box of Silence

SYNOPSIS

Owen Landis, young inventor, has developed an extraordinary "silencer," which is stolen from a safe in his laboratory. Landis tells Wally Markham, his chum, the only person, beside himself, knowing the combination of the safe, is Betty Lawson, with whom the inventor is in love. A plaster cast of a woman's footprint, found beneath the window of the laboratory, fits one of Betty's shoes. Betty tells Markham Herbert Canby, posing as a "promoter," had driven her home the previous night, and that she had dozed in the car. The safe in the bank at Perthdale is blown open and looted, the noise of the explosion being unheard. Satisfied that his "black box" is in the hands of crooks, Landis, with Markham, goes to Perthdale. Three strangers, claiming to be business men of Louisville, are the only possible suspects. Markham and Landis decide to follow them. At St. Joseph Markham learns Canby is driving west, with Betty Lawson and her father as guests in the car. Markham's car is stolen and wrecked. He buys another, and they go on. At Copah they meet Betty who explains the reason for her and her father's journey. A conversation between Canby and the three Louisville men convinces Markham and Landis they are on the right track. The commissary of the Cinnabar mine is robbed and two men killed. Again there was no sound. At Brewster they learn of the arrival of Canby and his party. William Starbuck, mine owner, tells them of Canby's crookedness.

CHAPTER VIII

—10—

A Lost Trail

"Some man—that!" said Landis praisefully, after Starbuck had gone. "What do you think of the glimpse he gave us of Canby's record?"

"What I think will be embodied in a wire tip to dad. Don't you want to wire your folks—just to let them know you are still on earth?"

"I will, now that we seem to have landed somewhere."

After they had sent their respective messages, they set out on a tour of inquiry, hoping to get some trace of the Fleetwing Eight and its passengers, taking the entire afternoon for it. It was an afternoon wasted. The three men, seen last as they were leaving Copah, had vanished as completely as if the earth had opened and swallowed them. And not only the men, but the car, as well.

In the round of inquiry only one circumstance developed which might have some bearing upon the mystery. This was in the public garage where Canby was keeping his Nordyke. When they questioned the proprietor about the Fleetwing, he said he had put up only one car that had come from the east that morning, namely, Canby's limousine. Landis asked if he could fix the time of the limousine's arrival.

"Why, yes," was the reply, "it was just about five o'clock."

"More mystery," said Landis, as they left the place. "You remember what the hotel clerk said this morning when we got in—which was a little after five o'clock?"

"Don't know as I do. I was pretty tired and sleepy."

"You asked him if he had anybody else from the east and he said, 'Yes,' a party of three—came in a couple of hours ago. Then he told us who the three people were."

"I see now what you are getting at. That leaves two hours unaccounted for between the time Canby reached Brewster and the time he put his car up in the garage. Question: can we find out what he did in those two hours?"

"That's it. If we can, I have a notion that we shall find out what has become of the Fleetwing bunch."

Returning to the hotel, they were fully agreed that the only remaining chance of tracing the missing three was through Canby, since his connection with them had been conclusively proved. Markham went up to shave, while Landis went to the desk to have his card sent up to the Lawsons.

"The professor and his daughter checked out this forenoon," was the information given him. "They have friends here—the Stillings—and Mr. Stillings came after them."

"Did Mr. Canby go with them?"

"Oh, no, he's still with us."

As Landis was turning away he came face to face with Starbuck.

"I was hoping I might run across one or both of you," said the mine owner, hospitably. "Whereabouts is Walter?"

"He has gone up to shave; he said he was too sleepy to do it when we came in this morning. Shall we hunt up a couple of chairs and wait for him?"

When they found chairs, Starbuck said, "I've just been reading in the evening paper of another showdown by the bandits—at the Cinnabar mine, over on the other side of the range. Maybe you heard of it as you came along? Or did you come in by the Led Horse Pass road?"

"No; we came the other way—by the mine. We got there pretty soon after the fact."

"Did you see Broughton?"

"Yes. We'd met him earlier. He was down at the railroad station with a truck and an armed guard, waiting for his payroll money, when we stopped to ask our way."

"The paper says there's a mystery; that there was a gun fight in which the two commissary guards were killed, and that nobody in the camp heard the firing or the explosion that wrecked the safe and the building. Is that so?"

"It is what Mr. Broughton told us."

"I can't sabe that," was Starbuck's comment. "I know the mine layout; been there any number of times. The commissary site isn't much over a hundred yards from Broughton's bungalow. Don't seem believable that nobody heard the racket."

Landis was surprised into saying, "It would have been not only unbelievable, but impossible, a few weeks ago, Mr. Starbuck."

"Why—what do you mean by that?"

Landis realized that he had said either too much or too little, and for the moment he saw no way out but by a relation of the black-box facts. And it was only the incredibility of the facts, as they must appear if given to a comparative stranger, that made him say, "Within a short time Wally and I have known of three other bank robberies which have been pulled off in exactly the same way; by dynamiting that nobody heard. The general belief seems to be that some new and absolutely noiseless explosive has been discovered."

"Pretty hard to make an old mining man swallow anything like that," Starbuck smiled. "Where were these bank robberies?"

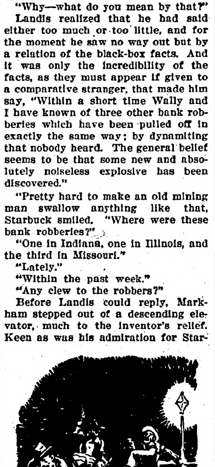
"One in Indiana, one in Illinois, and the third in Missouri."

"Lately."

"Within the past week."

"Any clew to the robbers?"

Before Landis could reply, Markham stepped out of a descending elevator, much to the inventor's relief. Keen as was his admiration for Starbuck, he was not quite ready to tell him—or anybody—that he himself, and Wally Markham, held the only clew that might lead to the identification of the robbers.



Markham Was Doing His Best, as a Skillful Amateur Boxer, to Keep From Sharing His Companion's Fate.

"I was hoping we might eat with you, Cousin William," said Markham. Then, "Been digging into Owen a bit to find out what he is made of?"

"We've been talking about this ruction over at Stan Broughton's mine. Mr. Landis tells me you just missed being in the thick of it."

"We did. Shall we go in to dinner?"

As was most natural, the table talk centered upon the crime of the night before, and the mystery which seemed to be the chief feature of it. But there was no mention made of the three men who had so unaccountably disappeared somewhere on the eastward road.

It was after coffee had been served that Landis saw a man rise from his seat at a table on the other side of the room and come across in their direction, though he did not recognize the man as Canby until the promoter was beside them, and saying, "Well, well! See who's here! Betty was telling me last night that you two were in Copah, but she didn't say anything about your coming on to Brewster." Then, "How do, Mr. Starbuck."

The three who were finishing their dinner reacted to the intrusion, each after his kind. Landis said nothing; Starbuck nodded, said, "How!" and went on sipping his coffee. Markham bridged the gap, chatting easily for a moment or two with the intruder, accounting for himself and Landis as vacation runaways from the home town, with no particular object in view, and expressing, in his turn, surprise that Canby could tear himself away from the Carthage promotion scheme, even for the pleasure of a motor trip in such good company as the professor and his pretty daughter.

At this last, the good-looking young promoter laughed and said, "Good company is right. But it so happened that I could combine business with pleasure. As you will testify, Mr. Starbuck, I still have a stake in the Timanyoni, in the Quavapai."

"Um," said the elderly mine owner.

"Thought I'd take a few days off and run out to see how we are getting along," Canby went on glibly; then, to the two Carthaginians, "We'll have to get together and do a bit of sightseeing. I assure you the Timanyoni is worth it."

As Canby returned to his table, Starbuck closed one eye slowly and said, "Did you two young fellows follow that crook out here?"

Markham answered truthfully. "No; we are both inclined to think it was the other way round—that he followed us. Anyhow, he was behind us for a good part of the way. And his surprise just now at seeing us here was a fake. He knew, three days ago, that we were headed this way."

Silence for a minute, and then Starbuck spoke again.

"Tell me, Walter, have you got anything on Canby?"

"No; but now he is here, and we're here, we'll try to keep cases on him, if only for the sake of enlightening some of our good friends in the home town. As I told you, he is trying to put over a deal something like the one he engineered here last summer, with—so my father thinks—just about as much profit to the investors in it."

"In that case—just a word to the wise, Walter. Slip a gun in your jeans if you're going to keep tab on that rooster. There were some queer doings here in connection with the bauxite mine deal that never did get out into daylight."

That night, as they were returning to the hotel after an evening spent with Starbuck in the all-but-deserted mansion in the mesa suburb, Landis said, "Your cousin gives Canby a worse name than the one we've been giving him back home." Then, "It hurts me savagely when I think of the hold he's got upon Betty."

"Oh, I don't know—" Markham was beginning; but before he could enlarge upon whatever doubt he had in mind, there were other things to think of. They had turned a corner, when three dark figures darted across the street in their rear. Before they could face about, Landis was staggering from a blow on the head, and Markham was doing his best as a skillful amateur boxer to keep from sharing his companion's fate.

Fortunately the best was fairly good. A jab to the solar plexus sent one of the assailants groaning, in the gutter, and a hook to the jaw discouraged another. But the third man hit Markham's guarding arm a paralyzing blow with some heavy weapon and was swinging for a second when help came in the shape of a night patrolman turning the corner. "Hey—officer!" Markham shouted. As the policeman came on the run, the two who were still afoot darted away, and the third man scrambled to his feet and bolted before the officer could come up.

"Now then—what's all this?" demanded the majesty of the law. "Was them fellies tryin' to hold ye up? Which way did they go?"

"Down that alley," and as the patrolman gave chase, Markham turned to Landis, who was holding his head in his hands.

"Bad hurt, Owen?"

"Sandbagged—knocked the senses out of me for a minute. What did they do to you?"

"Nothing much. Can you navigate?"

"I can walk all right. Sudden, wasn't it? What are they? Stick-up men?"

"I'm wondering. There was no 'hands-up!' about it. They acted more like hired killers. The first one I hit had his knife out. There it is now, in the gutter," and he stooped and picked up a vicious weapon with an eight-inch blade and a bone handle. "We'll keep this for a souvenir."

In their rooms at the hotel they took account of their casualties. They were not serious. Then they examined the knife Wally had picked up.

It was plainly of foreign manufacture, and on the smooth bone handle was carved a Spanish word which neither of them could translate.

"Mexicans," said Markham; "I thought they were. H'm; so they kill first and rob afterward, do they? And we had two perfectly good guns which we were careful to leave locked up safely here in the room! Never again, Owen, my boy. We go heeled after this. Let's turn in and forget it."

CHAPTER IX

In the Gulch

Going down to breakfast the next morning they found Starbuck waiting for them, and Markham told the mine owner what had befallen them after leaving his house.

"You say these fellows were Mexicans?"

"That's only a guess. I couldn't see them very well. I'm hanging the guess upon the butcher knife one of them dropped. It has a Spanish word carved on the handle," and he spelled out the word, "S-a-n-g-r-e."

"Huh! Goes well with what he meant to use it for; means 'to bleed.' Have you notified the police?"

"No; the policeman who chased them doubtless reported it. It's all over now, and isn't likely to happen again."

"Maybe not; we'll hope not." Then, out of a clear sky. "But just one word. Are you both sure the man we were talking about yesterday wouldn't be sorry to see you two laid out on an undertaker's cooling board?"

This appeared to be the proper time to make a full statement of the facts precedent to a man who would unquestionably prove a friendly and powerful ally; but a well-filled dining room was hardly the place for confidences.

"That would be rather far-fetched, wouldn't it? The man you refer to is barely on speaking terms with Owen; and the only grudge he can hold against me is my refusal to buy stock in his promotion schemes."

This ended the holdup talk and the conversation drifted to other things. Later, when Starbuck asked what they were going to do with their day, Markham said they were intending to drive about and have a look at Brewster and its surroundings. This brought forth an invitation from the mine owner.

The Fable of the Throw-Back

IT HAPPENS that in every Community small enough to permit all the Neighbors to keep a close tab on Family Skeletons and the most Intimate Affairs of all who are locally Important, there is a common Belief that whenever some shrewd and industrious Giant of Trade amasses a large, globular Hunk of Currency, his no-good Heirs immediately proceed to melt it down and get rid of it.

This Tradition in regard to the Spendthrift Inclinations of those who come into Easy Money has given rise to a Saying that in any Prominent Family there are only two Generations between Shirt Sleeves and Shirt Sleeves. The large Idea being that Grandpa rakes it in and piles it up and then Son starts in to celebrate with it, after which Grandson completes the Job of Distribution in a neat and workmanlike manner and finds himself sitting on the Curb without one Iron Man to rub against another, thereby completing the Cycle and setting himself back to the Zero Station from which his respected Grandparent started some 75 years earlier in the Game.

Listen to the Story of the Hoppers and you will learn how Elias toiled in his Shirt Sleeves away back yonder in 1855 and put in the Foundations of a tidy Fortune and now, in 1932, his only Grandchild, Cyril Hopper, is out in the Open every day, stripped down to his Shirt Sleeves, working eight times as hard as old Elias ever worked back yonder in the prehistoric Days of Beaver Hats, Top Boots, Tallow Candles and Fundamentalism.

He Was Good to His Dollars.

Elias descended upon the Middle West in a Prairie Schooner with a Small Assortment of Household Goods, the Trading Instincts of a Vermonter and a firm Belief that the worst Crime in the Category was to spend a Copper Coin which might be deposited in the Sock. He opened a Store and invited the Patronage of those who could pay. He collected Bad Accounts with the aid of a Musket.

The Employees at his Sawmill were paid $1 a day, and those who hauled Grain to his Grist Mill and traded for Flour and Meal could always drive back Home knowing that they had not taken any Mean Advantage of Elias.

While most of the other Residents were hunting and fishing or trying to solve the Slavery Question by Vocal Exertions, he was peering into the Future, visualizing the eventful Importance of Hoppersville and copping all of the good Corners on Main Street and most of the Frontage between. History tells us that the Lads who came from the Granite Hills out to the land of fruitful Plenty and wide-open Opportunity certainly made the other Pioneers look like timid Pikers.

Elias was in on every paying Proposition in the whole County, one of his best Stunts being to organize a Bank and corral all of the loose Capital of the Region and then loan it back to the Enterprises with which he was hooked up, at the same time carrying the Suckers along at Two Per Cent a Month, with all of their Vital Organs put up at Security.

He was more than a Captain of Industry. He was Commander-in-Chief of every known Form of legalized Graft. Every time a Dollar came to visit him at found a permanent Home.

A One-Word Vocabulary.

In due time the Go-Getter found himself worrying over a Son who had been Christened Alexander and who was being groomed to carry on the Noble Campaign of annexing as much as possible of the Western Hemisphere. He was sent to a first-class College and came back with a full Set of dark Side Whiskers and a Guitar. The sordid Details connected with the Store, the Bunk, the Sawmill, the Grain Elevator, the Farms, the Brick-Yard, etc., etc., did not appeal to him but he could Polka and Schottische until as late as 11 p. m., and often did so.

Elias died at a ripe Old Age and Alec came into Everything and immediately began to manage the complicated Estate with all of the Sagacity of a fresh-water Pickerel. He was what is known as a Good Fellow. That is, he would buy Anything that was for Sale, listen to any Bird who had a Song to sing, and fall for any Proposition outlined on beautiful Stationery. If Elias turned over in his Grave every time that Alexander got hooked and was spread from a Portion of the Legacy, then the old Gentlemen must have taken a lot of Exercise.

The Successor to the Throne invented new and spectacular Ways in which to be a Boob. He built a House which looked like a Resort Hotel and the Interior Decorators said he was a Lovely Man to work for because he had only one Word in his Vocabulary and that was "Yes."

He tried to ham-string the Board of Trade, taking his Tips from a Down-and-Outer who had been licked by the Market all his Life and whose Percentage as a Guesser was .000.

He went to Galleries in Europe and New York and bought Paintings which, the Come-On-Lads told him were by Celebrated Artists, than which there can be no more speedy Method of saying Good-Bye to the Bank Account.

He was Pie for Promoters who were letting a few Prominent Men of the Right Sort in on the Ground Floor. He needed two large Boxes at the Safety Deposit in which to store his Ducks and Drakes, Brick-Bats, Rags and Iron.

He entrusted all of his Business Affairs to those who complimented his Singing, and in all of his perfumed Career he never could find out how the Book-Keepers were keeping their Books. All he knew was that they were using the Red Ink and talking about Profit and Loss.

Alexander did all he could to ruin the Offspring. First he hung the Monicker of Cyril on to the defenseless Infant, then he hired an imported Governess to make the Child as European as possible, then he had the poor Kid take Violin Lessons, and finally he turned him over to a Tutor who had such a Brilliant Mind that he could not secure ordinary Employment.

Cyril was told every 20 Minutes that he must grow up to be an Aesthete and an Aristocrat—a Fleur de Lis blooming in the Corn Belt.

Gets Back to Nature.

They must have overdosed him. When Alexander went skyward a few years ago to contribute his throaty Tenor to the Heavenly Choir, young Cyril took a swift survey of the Situation and arrived at certain definite Conclusions.

According to all Rules and Precedents he should have taken what was left to the Estate and started another Jubilee. He had every Excuse for being a Spender, but after he looked over the alleged Securities in the Vault, he made a solemn inward Vow that, for all Time, he would play nothing but Cinches, Keep his Fingers crossed and never take his foot off of Second Base.

His demented Dad had not wasted all of the Corner Lots. The New England Ancestry asserted itself. Cyril said that the Unearned Increment, with a safe Trust Company as Manager, was good enough for him. He took a Lead Pencil and figured that all he needed was a few 99-Year Leases and several Bales of tax-exempt Bonds and complete Paralysis of the Helping Hand, and he would be fixed with an income which would stand up, no matter what the Head Waiters did to him.

Any one who says that All of the Progeny of the Prosperous are wild Wastrels simply ignores the plain Evidence. Cyril has joined the Colony of those who say "Nothing is too good for Us but we have practically no Acquaintances."

The Boy and his Bride are now in Florida and he is back to Shirt Sleeves, the same as his rugged Grandpa.

One Day he will be in his Shirt Sleeves out in the Gulf Stream, in his $16,000 Power Skiff, trying to land a Sail Fish.

Next Day he will be in his Shirt Sleeves out on the Polo Field, accompanied by 16 Pintos and 8 English Grooms, chukkering all over the Place and risking his Life to win the applause of other Incomes in radiant Apparel.

On the Third Day he will be in his Shirt Sleeves playing the Boca Gazabo Course for Ten a Hole with three jolly Companions whose Forebears likewise had the Sense to pick out some juicy Real Estate.

Take it Week in and Week out, no one works any harder than Cyril. Old Elias, as he looks down, or up at him, must be proud.

Possible for Blind to Become Capable Cooks

One of the most amazing developments of recent years has been the way in which blind people have been taught to perform marvelous processes which formerly were believed to require sight.

As a result of this, a great many men and women, who would formerly have been dependent upon relatives or institutions for the blind, have been able to earn their own living and have enjoyed a much fuller and more varied life.

But it is surprising to learn that it is now possible to teach blind people to cook, and that some of them have done very well, indeed, at this work. They distinguish different ingredients by means of the sense of touch. The same sense also helps them in measuring quantities and in the management of the cooking-stove.

Other senses come into play. Sound tells the blind cook when a liquid begins to simmer, when it gets hotter, and finally when it boils. And if a dish is cooking too quickly, that fact is advertised by the sense of smell. Electric stoves are safest for the blind cook.—London Answers.

Her Happiest Day

Nine-year-old Regina was always very fond of her brother Bennie, three years younger. One day she came home from school very much excited over the fact that they had been required to write a composition on the subject—"The Happiest Day of My Life." She began telling of what some of the little girls wrote about picnics, trips to the woods, when mamma asked her about what day she had written about.

"Oh," she replied, "I wrote about the day Bennie was born."

Famous Human Midget

Charles Sherwood Stratton (Tom Thumb) was born at Bridgeport, Conn., January 4, 1838, and died in Middleborough, Mass., July 15, 1883. He was taken by his mother to P. T. Barnum in 1842, and at that time was 28 inches in height and weighed about fifteen pounds. He was perfectly proportioned. Barnum exhibited him in England in 1854.

Tomb Living Quarters for Unemployed Worker

A man who had lived for nearly a year in a tomb and made his bed in a coffin, has been detained by the police of western Poland. A scare caused by a report that a ghost had been seen in the cemetery led to investigations by the police. They found that the tomb of an old Polish family named Torbus had been converted into a one-room flat. It contained, among other articles, a stove, a lamp, a chair, and a bookcase. They also found in it an unemployed worker, who said that he had taken up his abode there as he was unable to find other shelter.

His bed had been a metal coffin, from which he had evicted the remains of a Torbus of bygone years.

Hints to Housewives

"Mummie says, will you lend her your loudspeaker?"

"She wants to dance at this time of night?"

"No, she wants to sleep."—Stuttgarter Illustrierte (Stuttgart).

This Woman Lost 45 Pounds of Fat

"Dear Sirs: For 3 months I've been using your salts and am very much pleased with results. I've lost 45 lbs., 6 inches in hips and bust measure. I've taken 3 bottles—one lasting 5 weeks. I had often tried to reduce by dieting but never could keep it up, but by cutting down and taking Kruschen I've had splendid results. I highly recommend it to my friends."—Mrs. Carl Wilson, Manton, Mich.

To lose fat SAFELY and HARMLESSLY, take a half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast—don't miss a morning. To hasten results go light on fatty meats, potatoes, cream and pastries—a bottle that lasts 4 weeks costs but a trifle—but don't take chances—be sure it's Kruschen—your health comes first—get it at any drugstore in America. If not joyfully satisfied after the first bottle—money back.

UNDERWOOD & UNDERWOOD

Grandmother's Christmas Day

by Vivian Hayes

EFFIE ANN adjusted her furs and arose, her round black eyes refusing to meet the piteous gaze of the little old lady before her.

"I know you'll be reasonable, mother," she concluded, "and see that, needing money as Edwin does right now, he couldn't do differently. When pa died and Edwin bought this house of you to help you out, he had every notion of letting you stay right here, as he told you; but the $1,000 is absolutely needed to set us on our feet again—and with a customer turning up right now and willing to pay cash—well, 'twas nothing short of providential, and the deed was made out last night."

She bit her lip and reddened as she shot a furtive glance at the bent figure, then rushed on, nervously: "Of course you're to come right over with us as soon as Christmas is over. Packing up will be easy, for, knowing you'd have no further use for your furniture, Edwin's told the customer he could buy it just as it stood, and, of course, the money'll be yours—a nice, tidy sum—for Mr. Craig was all carried away with your braided rugs and old dishes and furniture; said it made him think of his boyhood home.
